While working on this book I have been fortunate to share the company and insights of colleagues in three very different university departments. I thank my friends at the National University of Ireland, Galway, University College Dublin, Dublin City University and elsewhere: especially (and in no particular order), John O'Dowd, Donncha O'Connell, Mairead Enright, Sinéad Ring, Niamh Howlin, Noel McGrath, Conor O'Mahony, Joe McGrath, Diarmuid Griffin, Colm O'Cinnéide, Desmond Clarke, Siobhán Mullally, Liam Thornton, Colin Scott, Gavin Barrett, Iseult Honohan, Rory O'Connell, Imelda Maher, Olivia Smith and Kevin Costello. As Heads of Law at UCD and NUI Galway, Colin Scott and Donncha O'Connell were particularly encouraging and supportive in facilitating my work on the manuscript. Further back, I will always remember the friendships I enjoyed with my fellow Ph.D. students in Cork. My friend and co-author, Tom, is a great exemplar of passion and sincerity. Above all I thank my wife and colleague, Eilionóir Flynn – for the example she sets for me in her non-sense enthusiasm and drive – and my parents, Tom Daly and Ann Sheehan, for all their support.

I begin with a word for my friends in the School of Law at NUI Galway. Having spent three years there as an undergraduate, more than three as a Ph.D. candidate and almost three years as an academic, I like to think I've been influenced by its great public law tradition. I also thank my new friends in the School of Law and Government at Dublin City University, in particular Head of School, Professor Gary Murphy. The blend of 'law' and 'government' makes for a wonderful scholarly dynamic in which I feel very much at home. (A word for the students at Dublin City University, too, especially the many who so vigorously grapple with the deeper questions). I thank Philip Pettit for his friendship and support at a critical juncture in my academic life. I'll always remember where I was when I first read the pages of Republicanism: the excitement I felt at finding a semblance of the intellectual direction that I had been seeking for many years. And I thank my co-author and friend Eoin, who has led this project along with many a conversation with me on the ideas in these chapters. I thank my wonderful mother, Maria, and Emer's parents, Terry and Mary. I remember my father, Paddy. I dedicate this book to him, and also to his granddaughter Sadhbh, born just the day after the final pre-review draft was submitted. Most of all, and as always, I thank Emer.
