ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Researching and writing this book has been a slow process and I have many to thank, at a number of institutions, for their help and support over the years. At La Trobe University I was lucky to work with and alongside a number of welcoming and stimulating colleagues. For their solidarity, support, and advice, a special thanks to Richard Broome, Roland Burke, Michelle Carmody, Claudia Haake, Gabby Haynes, Katie Holmes, Rhys Isaac, Diane Kirkby, Marilyn Lake, Damir Mitric, Nadia Rhook, and Randal Sheppard. I began writing this manuscript while employed as a Lecturer at Nura Gili Indigenous Programs Unit at the University of New South Wales, where many of the ideas were developed, challenged, and refined in conversations with a group of colleagues and comrades including Duane Hamacher, Leah Lui-Chivizhe, Sarah Keech, Ben Kelly, Martin Nakata, Vicky Nakata, Damien O'Reilly, and Virginia Watson. In mid-2016 I moved to the History Department at the University of Sydney, and I am especially grateful to Warwick Anderson, who offered me the time, space, support, and intellectual provocations that made completing this book a possibility. There I was part of a team researching 'Race and Ethnicity in the Global South', joining a wonderful group of scholars including Jamie Dunk, Sebastián Gil-Riaño, Miranda Johnson, and Sarah Walsh. And since the beginning of 2018 I have worked at the Australian National University, where Ann McGrath's project on 'Rediscovering the Deep Human Past' is continuing to challenge the way I think of Aboriginal histories and historiographies.

The research for Governing natives was made possible by the generous assistance of a number of librarians and archivists. I am particularly thankful to staff at the National Archives of Australia offices in Canberra and Darwin, the University of Sydney Archives, and the Bodleian Library of Commonwealth and African Studies in Oxford. Materially, this research was supported by the Lloyd Robson Memorial Award, travel funding provided by La Trobe University, and two Australian Research Council Laureate Fellowship grants: FL110100243 at the University of Sydney, and FL170100121 at the ANU.

I am grateful to those friends and colleagues whose care, encouragement, solidarity, and urges to write have been crucial. Thanks to Tamar Blickstein, Roland Burke, Jane Carey, Ann Curthoys, John Docker, Amanda Kearney, Dane Kennedy, Philippa Levine, Sophie Loy-Wilson, Fiona Paisley, Zora Simic, Audra Simpson, and Lorenzo Veracini. A special thanks to Claire McLisky, Erica Millar, and Crystal McKinnon, who have been dear friends and co-conspirators throughout this project, and from whom I have learnt immeasurably.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book has also benefited from the questions and criticisms of those who read it in various stages of development, from Gurminder Bhambra, Akira Iriye, and Gyan Prakash, who each read and commented on much earlier versions of some chapters, to Tracey Banivanua Mar, Penny Edmonds, Julie Evans, David Philips, and Patrick Wolfe, who were all wonderfully supportive readers and provided valuable advice and guidance, to my PhD examiners Ann Curthoys, Wm Roger Louis, and Henry Reynolds, whose helpful and encouraging feedback made this a better book. Roland Burke, Sara Dehm, Coel Kirkby, Jordy Silverstein, and Sarah Walsh all read drafts of various parts of the book and I am grateful for their many thoughts and suggestions. Emma Brennan has been a generous and patient editor, bearing with me through long periods of slow thinking and frenzied rewriting. Thanks also to the anonymous readers who helped refine the scope and whose advice ensured that this is a book that makes some sense.

I am especially thankful to Tracey Banivanua Mar and Patrick Wolfe, who formed an irrepressible team guiding me through research, thinking, and writing to develop new questions and more compelling answers. Tracey and Patrick were both brilliant; working with them was both daunting and exhilarating. I benefited from their demanding generosity, their insistent encouragement, and their suggested ideas, texts, and pathways to consider. The manuscript for this book was mostly written between their funerals, but many of the ideas in it emerged in conversations between us, whether in formal meetings or in countless impromptu chats; both Tracey and Patrick are threaded throughout this book and it is, in a substantial sense, theirs too.

Jordy Silverstein has been a keen interlocutor and challenging reader throughout this long process. Her work is an object lesson in integrity and critical sophistication and she has both made and helped me to do better. My parents, Rae and Mervyn Silverstein, have been a great source of support, love, and faith. Leo came along just as I should have been knuckling down to work on the manuscript and I've been lucky to enjoy his incessantly questioning nature and his regular reminders to 'stand up, fight back!' Sara Dehm has been a constant support, an indispensably critical and acute reader, and an enthusiastic adventurer as we've taken on new projects in new cities. She has discussed many of the ideas in this book in their first articulations and then picked them apart in written form to make them both clear and workable. Her love and her encouragement have been a part of this project from beginning to end.