The origins of this book lie in doctoral research that I undertook at the University of Strathclyde between 2010 and 2013. This was made possible by the award of a university scholarship, for which I am most grateful. I would like to thank my supervisor, James Mitchell, for guiding this project from the beginning and for the many excellent conversations about Scottish politics. Thomas Lundberg has been my ‘unofficial’ supervisor and mentor since first encouraging me to pursue an academic career when I attended his Scottish Politics Honours class. I have greatly appreciated his advice and encouragement. I first presented parts of this analysis to members of the Political Studies Association’s Conservatives and Conservatism specialist group. I would like to thank them, especially Richard Hayton and Matt Beech, for being a patient and supportive audience.

Douglas Pattullo’s encouragement and encyclopaedic knowledge of the Scottish Conservatives have been invaluable. Further afield, thank you to Adam Evans at Cardiff University for keeping me right about the intricacies of Welsh politics. Many serving and former politicians and officials gave freely of their time and expertise to talk to me about the Conservative Party. I would like to thank them for their generosity and I hope I have managed to capture something of their experience. Tony Mason at Manchester University Press and two anonymous reviewers have also been especially helpful.

I could not have reached this point without the support of my parents, Isobel and Bill Convery. This book is dedicated to them. Finally, thank you to James for all of his love and support.
