This work is the product of a lot of research, a lot of collaboration and a lot of wine. I’ve enjoyed all three, and regretted the third only in excess. Many friends and colleagues have helped to proof-read and critique sections of my work, stemming from time in a number of institutions, firstly St Andrews, then Queen Mary and now UCL. Andrew Dodd willingly discussed many of this project’s minutiae, providing an excellent sounding board and partner for debate. Stephen Tyre and Jerry DeGroot encouraged my interest and enthusiasm for this topic when I was still an undergraduate. Julian Jackson was a generous and engaging supervisor of the thesis on which this work was based. His tireless engagement with the project was crucial to its completion, and development thereafter. Colin Jones was also extremely kind to take the time to provide comments and guidance on my thesis. My examiners, Robert Gildea and Richard Vinen, encouraged me to explore key points in my argument and provided many suggestions that helped to improve this work. Eleanor Davey and Ed Naylor provided useful insight and constructive criticism of various chapters when this work was in its infancy. Alison Carrol and Noelle Plack provided important insight on early chapter drafts, and the overall direction of the book. Chris Jeppesen has provided useful comments on drafts and encouraged me to address new topics within the study. In putting together the outline and proposal, both Ludivine Broch and Margot Finn were generous with advice and suggestions from their own experiences. I am extraordinarily thankful for the input and thoughts of these scholars, and the positive influence they have had on my work. There are many others, in addition, who have helped shape the content of this book, and for that I am grateful. Mention need also be made of my rugby team, the Clapham Strokers, a social foil to a scholarly life.

Researching the history of wine was an enjoyable experience, and the Languedoc is a wonderful place to visit and to study. This project relied on the support of a number of Departmental Archives across the region. In particular, the archivists at the Archives Départementales de l'Aude must constitute some of the finest in France. They flagged up many relevant works, not to mention that of Lawrence McFalls, when they assumed that the name ‘McFalls’ must mean he was Scottish and wondered if we were acquainted. Lawrence McFalls (Université de Montréal) subsequently provided advice by correspondence, and was helpful in delineating the boundaries of this study. Michelle Zancarini-Fournel (Université de Lyon) was also very generous in her advice relating to Montredon’s relationship with 1968. I must likewise express gratitude to those that responded to interviews, whether that contact was by email, telephone or simply my knocking unexpectedly upon their door. Some of those approached offered advice and guidance in longer correspondences. Amongst these was Jean Clavel, a prolific commentator with many publications and an active blog. His book Mondialisation des vins was kindly donated to the author by Mme Béatrice de Chabert of the Syndicat AOC Coteaux de Languedoc. The Editor of Paysan du Midi, Philippe Cazal, was also generous with his time and knowledge and even kind enough to forward me articles of interest. These researchers and professionals were kind enough to support me, even as I contacted them out of the blue.

The Society for the Study of French History has also been a great help, both through its financial support and its efforts to foster the discussion of French history more broadly. I have been extraordinarily lucky to be involved with the Society and its committee. I have learned a lot and made good friends along the way.

I am grateful to my family, who have remained convinced that I would complete this project and succeed thereafter, specifically my mother, Christine. Finally, my wife, Holly, has provided constant support. She has proof-read copious drafts and listened patiently to plans, ideas and arguments as the book took shape. Both her encouragement and her belief were as essential to the completion of this piece as she is to me.
