First, I would like to thank the Arts and Humanities Research Council for funding research into the archive of the film producer Gavrik Losey, held in the Bill Douglas Centre at the University of Exeter. I was lucky enough to be employed as the postdoctoral research associate on this project in the School of Arts, Languages and Literatures at the University of Exeter between 2006 and 2008. This book represents the culmination of that work. Second, I would like to thank the Department of Theatre, Film and Television Studies at Aberystwyth University for granting me research leave for a semester in 2011 in order to finish this book, and for funding some short research trips. Third, I would like to thank the British Academy for awarding me a grant to research Babylon (Franco Rosso, 1980).

During the researching and writing of this book I have benefited greatly from the experience and generosity of a number of individuals – industry professionals, academic colleagues and very good friends. Many, many thanks to Kate Woodward, Sue Harper, Duncan Petrie, and Andrew Spicer for generously reading drafts of sections of this book, and offering sound suggestions concerning how I might improve it. Thanks to Gavrik Losey for engaging warmly with my research, and educating me enthusiastically about the finer points of British cinema in the 1970s and beyond. Thanks to Waris Hussein, Lord Puttnam and Franco Rosso for making themselves available for interviews. I would like to thank Duncan Petrie for his support and encouragement during my days at the University of Exeter and subsequently. I also want to thank Steve Neale for his careful guidance of my work during the Gavrik Losey research project. For their support and encouragement (in a number of different ways), I want to further thank (in no particular order) Sarah Street, Justin Smith, Charlotte Brunson, Claire Monk, Dan North, Paul Williams, Kate Egan, Helen Hanson, Phil Wickham, Will Stone, Sid Stronach and Tim Noble. I also owe a debt of gratitude to my students.

Thanks to the staff at the British Film Institute Reading Room, the Bill Douglas Centre at the University of Exeter, and the Hugh Owen library at Aberystwyth University. And to the contributors to the 'Don't Look Now?' conference I organised at the University of Exeter in July 2007.

Many thanks to Adrian Kear and Jamie Medhurst, my Heads of Department at Aberystwyth University, for their belief in me and my work, and their commitment to research in the Department of Theatre, Film and Television Studies. I also want to record my gratitude to the management team and administrative staff in the Department – especially Kath Williams, Ceris Medhurst-Jones, Glenys Hartnell, and Catrin Davies. And many thanks go to the staff at Manchester University Press, who were supportive of this book from the beginning.

Thanks to my parents, Roy and Mary, for their continuing love and support. And to Peter and Liz Nellist for everything they continue to do to help Kate, myself, and our family. Thanks to Annabel and Edward, whose many appearances in my office at home when I was writing this book were always very welcome interruptions, even if I didn't always make this clear at the time. Finally, thanks, most of all, to Kate, without whom this book would simply not have been possible.
