Acknowledgements

This book has taken me a couple of years to write and I have benefited from the generous assistance and help of several people along the way, all of whom I would like to take this opportunity to thank. I am fortunate enough to be part of a Department where collegiality and a collaborative research culture are not embellishments for our REF submissions but accurately reflect my experience since joining the University of Sheffield in 2007. My colleagues, past and present, including Garrett Brown, Alasdair Cochrane, Inanna Hamati-Ataya, Graham Harrison, Mike Kenny, and Andrew Vincent, are all scholars in the truest and best sense of the term. All of them have had to tolerate, some more willingly than others, numerous papers, draft chapters, or general discussions about realism, and I am indebted to each and every one of them. Some of this material has also been presented at several conferences or workshops over the years, and I would like to thank those who attended and offered comments, in particular Alex Bavister-Gould, John Dunn, Derek Edyvane, Elizabeth Frazer, Ed Hall, John Horton, Glen Newey, Jon Parkin, Janosch Prinz, Enzo Rossi, Steve Smith, and Tim Stanton. Special thanks are owed to Rob Lamb who very kindly organised a symposium on the manuscript for this book at the University of Exeter in December 2012. I am very grateful to all those who participated in the symposium for their comments and feedback, and especially to Richard Bellamy from whose observations I benefited enormously.

While this manuscript bears little relation to my PhD thesis, nevertheless one of the central ideas here – that liberalism is unable to fully comprehend its own contested and partisan nature, and hence of politics properly understood – is one that I was struggling to both understand and express during my time as a research student at the University of York. The Morrell Centre of Toleration at the University of York remains one of the most vibrant and active hubs of research in political theory in the UK, and it was a truly wonderful and privileged place to undertake a PhD. I would like to thank my PhD supervisors Susan Mendus and Matt Matravers for their generosity in terms of time, advice and, in particular, patience.

The writing of this monograph has also coincided with several changes in my personal life, the most important and happiest of which was my marriage to Nicola in November 2010. She has had to live and breathe this book with me, and her tolerance and support have been invaluable. I cannot thank her enough.

But I want to dedicate this book to my parents, Ian and Edwina Sleat. My previous attempt at a dedication to express my appreciation for their support was woefully inadequate, for which I apologise profusely. So this time I will simply say, though from the bottom of my heart: thank you.
