The research in this monograph was supported by an Irish Research Council Fellowship. Upon moving to Dublin in 2009, I became intrigued by the question of how and why Irish dietary customs adjusted so dramatically after the Famine. While developing this initial idea, I discovered a rich array of printed and archival documents relating to food in Ireland since the Famine. The topic of consumption and production in post-Famine Ireland transpired to be one of deep complexity and enormity. This monograph recaptures some of the key areas of debate between the Famine and Irish independence in 1922.

I wish to thank Dr Catherine Cox for her support for my project. The Centre for the History of Medicine in Ireland where I pursued this research provided an active environment in which I learnt about, explored and began to appreciate modern Irish medical history. In particular, David Durnin, Sarah York, Mary Daly, Lindsey Earner-Byrne, Kirsten Mulrennan, Fiachra Byrne and Tom Feely proved to be excellent colleagues to work beside. I especially wish to thank Anne Mac Lellan for her enthusiasm for my research and the discussions which we regularly shared about Irish medical history. Further afield, Leanne McCormick, James Vernon, Michael Worboys, Hilary Marland, Carol Helstosky, James Kelly, Keith Smith, Philomena Gorey and Sean Lucey provided ongoing support for my research and academic career as did Ian Burney who I particularly wish to acknowledge.

I am indebted to Juliana Adelman for our in-depth discussions about late nineteenth-century Irish abattoirs; Christopher Hamlin for our enthusiastic conversations about the Irish stomach; Ciara Breathnach for directing me towards historical resources relating to Irish tea-drinking habits; David Gentilcore for sharing his research on the history of the potato; and Senia Pařeta for discussing her research on Maud Gonne's Ladies School Dinners Committee with me.

The archival staff at the British Library, National Library of Ireland, Public Record Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI), Royal College of Physicians of Ireland, Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland and the Wellcome Library were always helpful, accommodating and efficient. In particular, Harriet Wheelock and Robert Mills at the Royal College of Physicians of Ireland Heritage Centre and Mary O'Doherty at the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland were particularly supportive and accommodating. I am particularly grateful to the Deputy Keeper of Records, Public Record Office of Northern Ireland for allowing me to reproduce my cover image. Images have also been reproduced courtesy of the National Library of Ireland.

I wish to acknowledge Manchester University Press for being extremely supportive and efficient throughout the entire process of publishing this monograph. An earlier draft of Chapter 1 was previously published in Medical History. I am indebted to the editor of the journal, Sanjoy Bhattacharya, and Cambridge University Press for allowing me to reproduce aspects of this research that directly discuss the Famine. I presented various aspects of this monograph at workshops, conferences and events at University College Dublin, the Institute of Historical Research in London, Mater Dei Institute of Education, University of Limerick and City University London. I would like to thank the organisers and audiences for their suggestions and thoughts.

Finally, I especially wish to thank Kevin Miller, Pauline Miller, Sarah Miller, Katie Miller and Miriam Trevor.
