ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many of the ideas in this book originated in my PhD, awarded by the University of Cambridge in 2010. First thanks must go to Anna Abulafia, my MPhil and PhD supervisor, for her diligent attention to my studies and well-being during my time in Cambridge and beyond. Further valuable feedback on my work was provided by Peter Stacey, Magnus Ryan and Joe Canning. I am grateful for opportunities to have presented parts of this work to colleagues, notably at the John of Salisbury Colloquium held in Durham (2012) and at 'Jean de Salisbury: Nouvelles lectures, nouvelles enjeux' at the Université de Lorraine, Metz (2015). My studies at Cambridge were funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council (UK), a Robert Gardiner Memorial Scholarship, the Cambridge European Trust, an Isaac Newton Research Studentship, the Elizabeth Kolb Memorial Trust and Gonville and Caius College; my thanks to all of these for their financial support. Meanwhile, I owe a huge debt of a different kind to Alex Bamji, Lucy Rhymer, Graham St John and Alex Sapoznik, with whom I shared my PhD years and many years of friendship since.

I'm particularly grateful to Eddie Hyland and Ian S. Robinson of Trinity College Dublin, my alma mater, for their introductions to political thought and medieval history, respectively. Although they are now scattered far and wide, thanks are also due to my circle of Dublin friends – Alison MacIntyre, Mánu de Barra, Kevin Byrne, Karola McGetrick, Helen Airton, Susannah Gibson and Audrey Harwood. The book was written between three countries. Kate Pruce has experienced all three with me, providing kindness and tea throughout. Sarah Courtauld has been a continuous source of friendship, hospitality, and sound advice. Nicola Cossburn, Krista Kajberg, Tereza Pavlickova and Eva Streglova have inspired and supported me every summer during our annual holidays.

The writing of this book occurred alongside a number of other projects and posts. From 2011 to 2014, I worked at Leiden University on the Nederlandse Organisatie voor Wetenschappelijk Onderzoek-funded project 'Turning Over a New Leaf: Manuscript Innovation in the Twelfth Century'. My colleagues Erik Kwakkel, Jenneke Janzen, Julie Somers and Jenny Weston became great friends and made those three years incredibly enjoyable, as well as intellectually stimulating. Peter Liebrechts has been an essential source of steady support, inspiration, and patient kindness since my time in Leiden – bedankt. From 2014 to 2017, I worked at the John Rylands Research Institute at the University of Manchester, which proved a fruitful environment to complete the draft manuscript of this book; Katharina Keim, Stefania Silvestri and Julianne Simpson were particularly encouraging cheerleaders throughout this process. Mariken Teeuwen at Huygens ING generously gave me the time required to complete the final manuscript. Thanks are due, too, to the editorial staff at Manchester University Press for their practical aid and advice, and to Stephen Rigby, who, along with the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript, offered valuable suggestions of how to improve its text.

While this book is a product of time spent in different places, an important constant has been my family, who have provided practical and emotional support throughout. The last thanks go, therefore, to those who were there from the first – to my parents and brothers for the wonderful opportunities for education I had, both in and out of the classroom. This book is dedicated to the memory of Dorothy C. Connor (1913–2004) and Paddy ‘Panda’ O’Daly (1911–2006), who supported this project (and me) at its start, and, I know, would have been proud of its completion. Requiescant in pace.
