From the beginning this book has been the work of many hands. It was in 2009 that the Modern Poetry Reading Group in the Centre for Modern Poetry at the University of Kent embarked on a collective reading of Charles Olson's writing. A rich conversation quickly emerged among regular members of the group (Luke Currie, Laurie Duggan, Kate Fox, Nancy Gaffield, Michael Grant, Edward Greenwood, Ben Hickman, Brian Madden, Jan Montefiore, Todd McEwen, Kat Peddie, Simon Smith and Juha Virtanen) and it was as a result of that conversation that the plan to hold an Olson centenary conference was hatched. Preparation for that British-based re-assessment of Olson's work was greatly assisted by the generous advice of Steve Collis, who was already in the process of arranging a centenary event in Vancouver. It is a great pleasure to thank Steve here, for his ongoing friendship and commitment to intellectual exchange. Thanks are also due to all the speakers and delegates at the conference for making that occasion a moment for such serious reflection, not only on Olson's work but on the work of those with whom he was in dialogue. Particular gratitude is due to those who gave keynote lectures at the event: Elaine Feinstein, Stephen Fredman, Ralph Maud, Peter Middleton and Iain Sinclair.

Stephen Fredman and Peter Middleton have acted as editorial advisors on the book throughout its preparation and I am very grateful to them for the generosity with which they have given their time and expertise. Many others have also contributed to the book's shape and intellectual approach and I am glad to be able to thank the following people for their conversation and writing: David Ayers, Vincent Broqua, Olivier Brossard, Anthony Caleshu, Michael Farrell, Peter Gizzi, Fiona Green, Robert Hampson, Daniel Kane, Daniel Katz, Kristen Kreider, Miriam Nichols, Redell Olsen, Sarah Posman, Will Montgomery, Lytle Shaw, and Ann Vickery.

As the editor of Contemporary Olson I am extremely grateful to the book's contributors, not just for the quality of their work but for the time and attention they have given to the project as a whole. There has been a shared sense that the moment is right to re-consider Olson's contribution to postwar poetry and culture and it been a great pleasure to be in conversation about the questions and possibilities his work brings in to view. It is worth underlining that this conversation is international, the book bringing together writers and scholars from Australia, Belgium, Britain, Canada and the USA. The fact that the book's contributions come from this range of intellectual contexts shows that Olson's aesthetic continues to speak well beyond its immediate setting.

Funding for the original conference, and for related research activities, was generously provided by the British Academy, the Kent Institute of Advance Studies in the Humanities (KIASH) and the School of English. This is an appropriate place also to recognize the ongoing support that the University of Kent has given to the study and development of modern poetry, not least through its support for such collaborative ventures as the Sounds New Poetry festival, the performance series Free Range and the poetry collective Zone. Works by Charles Olson published during his lifetime are held in copyright by the Estate of Charles Olson. Previously unpublished works by Charles Olson are copyright of the University of Connecticut Libraries. Permission for the reproduction of such work is gratefully acknowledged here, as is the generous assistance of Melissa Watterworth, Curator of Archives and Special Collections at the University of Connecticut's Thomas J. Dodd Research Center.

As on previous occasions, I am very grateful to Manchester University Press for the care and commitment with which they have prepared the volume. In particular I am glad to be able to thank Matthew Frost (a great friend to poetry) for commissioning and sustaining the project.

My personal thanks go, as always, to Abi, Lily and Eli, with whom it is my great good fortune to share a life. The book is dedicated to my parents, whose life-long commitment to state education chimes deeply with the values of Olson's own teaching.
