ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The idea for this book grew out of the international workshop 'Developing Africa – Development Discourse(s) in Late Colonialism', organised by Gerald Hödl and Martina Kopf, and held at the University of Vienna in January of 2011. Many of the following essays were presented first at the workshop, which brought together scholars from varied disciplinary backgrounds working and studying at universities across three continents: Africa, Europe, and North America. This made for three days of stimulating discussion and debate, not only concerning different approaches to the study of development, but also about the very meaning of development itself. We wish to thank the workshop participants whose work, for various reasons, does not appear in the volume: Aram Ziai, Regina Finsterhölzl, Cyrus Veese, Susan Zimmerman, Julian Reid, Mamadou Fall, Karlheinz Spitzl, Hubertus Büschel, Suzanne Hanson, and Ewald Blocher. We also wish to give thanks to the convenors, discussants, and roundtable participants for their hard work: Heike Schmidt, Hanna Hacker, Berthold Unfried, Birgit Englert, Henning Melber, Marie Rodet, Margarete Grandner, Walter Schicho, Andreas Eckert, Odile Goerg, and David Simon.

A number of other people deserve credit for inspiring and supporting the publication of this volume. A special word of acknowledgement goes to Robert W. Shenton, one of the pioneers of development history, who gave one of the keynote addresses at the workshop. In light of the central role his ideas have played, not only for the book but in our thinking about the history of development generally, we wish to express our much-deserved appreciation: thank you, Bob. This publication would also not have come to fruition without the support of Walter Schicho, one of the founders of the Development Studies Programme at the University of Vienna and director of the research project 'Colonial Concepts of Development in Africa, 1920–1960'. Not only did Walter contribute one of the chapters to this collection, but he was instrumental in the editing and revisions of several other essays as well as offering valuable feedback and advice on the volume as a whole. We also would like to thank Matthew Vester and Marta Hodge for their assistance in translating Céline Pessis's chapter and Cláudia Castelo's chapter respectively, and to Billy Frank, whose friendship, humour, and constructive criticism helped us stay on track throughout the process.

Credit must also be reserved for the Austrian Science Fund, who financed three years of research into colonial concepts of development in Africa and made the workshop and this publication possible. Joe Hodge would like to acknowledge the support of West Virginia University for providing faculty development and travel funding during the time he spent working on the book project. Finally, our gratitude goes to the history editor, Emma Brennan, for working with us on the book and for guiding us patiently through every stage in the process. This book is also part of the larger series, 'Studies in Imperialism'. We would like to thank the series editors, John M. MacKenzie and Andrew S. Thompson for their support for the project. It is an honour to be associated with this long-standing and prestigious body of work.
