Acknowledgements

This book closes the circle on a body of research on advertising, commercial culture and social change which I have undertaken over the last twenty-five years. It follows two other books, Hard Looks (UCL Press, 1996) and Advertising Cultures (Sage, 2003), which explored developments in the 1980s and 1990s. Hard Sell moves the analysis not forwards but backwards in time and focuses on the 1950s and 1960s. Given the historical focus, archives and libraries have figured centrally in the research for this book. I am especially grateful to the staff at the History of Advertising Trust for their help and support in exploring the written archives of British advertising which they hold. Margaret Rose has always made my visits to HAT enjoyable and Chloe Veale, Edward Vanderpump and David Thomas were immensely generous with their knowledge, time and patience in the face of my many requests. Eve Read and Maggie Cammiss kindly helped with the tracking down of copyright for the images used in the book. The late Michael Cudlipp and Barry Cox were both genial and supportive chief executives of HAT during my numerous visits. Governors of HAT were also supportive of my research and many gave their time for the 'Advertising Lives' oral history project which I undertook in 2008. In particular I am grateful to Archie Pitcher CBE, David Bernstein, Graham Hinton, Sir John Hegarty and Winston Fletcher. Jeremy Bullmore, John Salmon, Peter Mead and David Puttnam also generously agreed to be interviewed for the project.

Librarians at the John W. Hartman Center for Sales, Advertising and Marketing History were extremely helpful during my visit there in the summer of 2004, as were staff at the National Archives, Kew; the British Library; Unilever Archives, Port Sunlight; Mass Observation Archives, University of Sussex; the National Galleries of Scotland, Edinburgh; and the University of Essex, especially Nigel Cochrane. The research would not have been possible without the support of the study leave arrangements at the University of Essex and its research promotion fund. I also benefited from a British Academy small research grant. This funded research by two research assistants, Rachel Duffet and Lorena Rivero de Beer. My thanks to them and to the British Academy. Travel to Duke University in 2004 was supported by a travel grant from the Hartman Center.

The ideas developed in this book have benefited from being aired at various seminars and conferences and I am particularly grateful to audiences at the Hagley Museum and German Historical Institute, Delaware; Centre for British Studies, Humboldt-Universität, Berlin; Dublin Institute of Technology; Institute of Historical Research, University of London; Department of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Southampton; Department of Media and Communications, University of Leicester; Centre for Research in Economic Sociology and Innovation, Department of Sociology, University of Essex; and to all participants at the 'Rethinking Affluence, Socio-cultural Change in Britain c. 1950–2000' event hosted by CRESC, University of Manchester.

Many colleagues and friends have shaped my thinking and offered good advice over the years. A special thank you to Michael Bailey, Ted Benton, Robin Blackburn, Kerstin Brückweh, Suzanne Burke, David Clampin, Paul du Gay, Peter Gurney, Stuart Hall, Mark Harvey, Clark Eric Hultquist, Angela McRobbie, Mike Savage and Stefan Schwarzkopf. Frank Mort was an important sounding board in the early stages of the project and provided helpful comments towards the end. Bill Schwarz has been an important source of support and encouragement and has read and commented upon a number of the chapters. Mike Roper read a complete first draft of the book and commented on later versions. His perceptive comments and support (at times beyond the call of duty) have added much to my final arguments. Claire Nixon has lived with this book and offered thoughtful comments at various points. Her humour, love and wisdom have made its completion possible. The book is dedicated to her, with love.