Making Home is a collaborative and co-written study by three scholars who have worked closely together with the book from its inception to its completion. We have brought to this work a shared background in American literary studies, our specializations within this field, and our knowledge of other areas such as gender studies and memory studies. In our exploration of orphanhood and kinship, we have been able to draw upon insights accrued during Elizabeth Kella's previous work on representations of ethnic communities in American fiction; Maria Holmgren Troy's earlier research on American domesticity, as well as her work on memory, trauma, and genre; and Helena Wahlström's research on representations of American families, particularly fatherhood and masculinity. Collaboration and collective writing of chapters have broadened and deepened our study. More than the sum of its parts, the dynamic of the project has taken us into new territories in terms of the writing process and enabled us to ask new, or at least different, questions about literary American orphans making home.

Time to write, together as well as apart, is absolutely essential in order to carry through a book project such as Making Home. A generous three-year grant from the Swedish Research Council has provided research time and, at times, opportunities for the three of us to work together in the same location despite our geographically dispersed academic homes. We are grateful to Helge Ax:son Johnson's Foundation for giving Liz Kella and Helena Wahlström a travel grant to the British Library, where they worked together for two weeks in 2008. We also spent two weeks together in the British Library in 2009 thanks to a grant from the Magnus Bergvall Foundation. Maria Holmgren Troy would like to express her gratitude to the School of English, Film,

Theatre, and Media Studies at Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand, where she worked on the book project as a visiting scholar for two and a half months. We also want to acknowledge the editor of American Studies in Scandinavia for granting us permission to reprint excerpts from two articles that appeared in that journal in 2010 and 2011, as parts of Chapters 2 and 5.

About halfway through the project, we arranged an international symposium on representations of family at Uppsala University, in conjunction with a full-day workshop in which Caroline Levander and Marianne Novy offered feedback on first drafts of three chapters. The generous, thought-provoking, and productive comments and questions we received from them helped us strengthen the focus of Making Home. Funding for the symposium was granted by the Royal Swedish Academy of Letters; support was also provided by the Centre for Gender Studies and the English Department at Uppsala University. The Swedish Research Council kindly helped fund the workshop with an additional grant. We would also like to thank Donald E. Pease for taking the time to discuss the project. Thanks are also due to all who have offered constructive comments and suggestions at conferences, symposia, and seminars throughout the project, and to the team at Manchester University Press and external readers. Our most heartfelt thanks go to the series editors, Sharon Monteith and Nahem Yousaf, who acted as ideal readers of our book manuscript and helped us improve and refine it beyond what we could have achieved on our own. Finally, thanks to all our loved ones, near and far.
