I have accumulated more debts in writing this book than I will ever be able to remember, let alone repay. This book was made possible with the generous support of the Arts and Humanities Research Council, the Huntington Library and the Leverhulme Trust. My thanks are due to the kind and patient staff at the British Library and the National Archives, as well as at the other university libraries and local archives where I have spent a fair chunk of my time for the past few years.

The History Department at the University of Sheffield was a wonderful place to do my PhD, and I would like to thank George Newberry, Matt Phillpott, Sarah Rawlins, Jack Rhoden, Gary Rivett, Robin Scaife and Daniel Turner for conversation, games of Risk and cups of tea. James Shaw and Mark Greengrass, as secondary supervisors, provided some very useful perspectives and suggestions. I would particularly like to thank Peter Lake and Michael Braddick, the examiners of my PhD thesis, who both made invaluable criticisms and suggestions.

I would also like to thank all the staff in the History department (and beyond) at Durham University, where (among others), Alex Barber, John Clay, David Gehring, Natalie Mears, Nicole Reinhardt, Stephen Taylor, Philip Williamson and Andy Wood have welcomed me and created a fantastic research culture. I’d particularly like to thank Alex Barber for getting in touch with me and inviting me to apply for a fellowship, as well as Stephen Taylor and Philip Williamson, who helped me to thrash out the proposal, using up a lot of red ink in the process.

I am grateful to the editors and staff at the Journal of Early Modern History for their kind permission to use some of the material that appeared as ‘Misinformation and disinformation in late Jacobean court politics’, Journal of Early Modern History 16 (2012).

I would also like to thank the series editors and staff at Manchester University Press for their kind help. I would particularly like to thank the reviewers of my proposal and typescript, including Alastair Bellany, Thomas Cogswell and Richard Cust, for taking the time to make such useful comments and suggestions.

I am deeply indebted to Alex Barber, David Cressy, Janet Dickinson, Alex Gajda, Mark Greengrass, Chris Kyle, Steve May, J. Sears McGee, Natalie Mears, George Newberry, Stephen Taylor, Lizzy Williamson and Neil Younger, among others, for discussing ideas, providing references or allowing me to read unpublished drafts of their own work. Four people deserve special thanks. Simon Healy and Michael Questier read early drafts of my thesis when they had many better things to be doing. They have both been extremely kind, helpful and generous, and gossiping with them about Jacobean politics has been fun and hugely enlightening. Thomas Cogswell gave me some extremely useful advice about the structure and scope of this book, and although I’m not sure the end product matches his ambitions for it, I am very grateful for his generous help. Noah Millstone was kind enough to give a draft of the book a very thorough critical reading, and I’d like to thank him for all his help. As with all of those who have been generous enough to read drafts and provide feedback, any errors or inadequacies that remain in this book are entirely my own.

It was my good fortune to have Anthony Milton as my PhD supervisor. Ever since I emailed him to ask if there might be a way for me to return to historical research, he has been unfailingly helpful, encouraging, generous and funny. His acute comments and observations have improved this study tremendously, and it could never have been written without his help and support. The debt I owe him is greater than I could possibly acknowledge.

Finally, I owe my greatest debt to Georgina Lyons for her love, help and forbearance.
