This book owes its completion to the efforts of many people. It began as a doctoral thesis, based at the Open University, which was completed in 2009 under the supervision of Professor James Chapman and examined by Professor Jeffrey Richards. Both suggested that the thesis should be made into a book. I am very grateful to Manchester University Press and Matthew Frost for agreeing to do this. The project would not have been possible without its subject Lord Attenborough, who has supported my work from its inception, granting me a succession of interviews and providing me with much additional information. Lord Attenborough’s associate, Diana Hawkins, has been helpful in obtaining answers to obscure questions that I posed, while Gabriel Clare-Hunt his personal assistant, has been diligent in arranging meetings. I owe my initial introduction to Lord and Lady Attenborough to my mother-in-law, Margot Dux.

Film historians have played an important role, particularly those regular attendees of the Issues in Film History seminars, held at the Institute of Historical Research. I am particularly grateful to Professor Anthony Aldgate, Dr Mark Glancy, Professor Sue Harper, Dr James C. Robertson, Dr Robert James and Dr Myra Cross for their help and advice. I have also benefited from colleagues Dr Guy Barefoot and Philip Kemp of the Department of History of Art and Film at the University of Leicester. Other individuals have also played important roles. Particular mention must be made of Professor Bert Hogenkamp, who translated several Dutch reviews of A Bridge Too Far. Terence Clegg, Charles Chilton and the late Major-General Ian Gill, all willingly imparted their knowledge, experiences and opinions giving me their valuable time for interviews.

Acknowledgement must also be made to the facilities made available from the British Library (including the Colindale Newspaper Library), the National Archives at Kew and the library at the University. of Leicester. In particular, the British Film Institute Reading Room and Special Collections Department have offered expert advice within a friendly and encouraging environment. I am also grateful to the administrators of the BECTU History Project for allowing me access to their tapes.

I am especially indebted to James Chapman, who has continued to offer advice and also provide constructive comments on draft chapters. His continued support, academic guidance and generosity of time have all been invaluable.

Family members have remained a backbone of support. My daughter, Dr Emma Dux, has offered encouragement and practical advice, while my son Marcus has always been quick to offer his computer expertise. Special mention must be given to my husband Tony who has consistently provided wonderful support and encouragement. I could not have done this without him.

This book is dedicated to the memory of my parents who, as former passionate cinema goers, showed much interest in my thesis but, sadly, did not live to see its completion.
