ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It was the image of St Francis Xavier’s corpse as it lies in Goa today that guided me through the conceptualization and writing of this book. My first fieldwork trip to Goa (summer 1997) was made possible by a Social Science Research Council Pre-dissertation Fellowship. Archival research in Portugal (1998–9) was made possible by financial support from Fulbright IIE and the Luso-American Educational Commission. Here I would like to thank the various staffs at the Torre do Tombo, the Arquivo Histórico Ultramarino, the Biblioteca Nacional, the Brotéria, and the Biblioteca da Sociedade de Geografia de Lisboa. Archival research and fieldwork in Goa (1999–2000) was made possible by financial support from the American Institute for Indian Studies Dissertation Research Fellowship [AIIS]. Here I would like to thank the various staffs at the Xavier Center of Historical Research, the Central Library, the Archaeological Survey of India (Goa branch), the library at Goa University and the State Archives of Goa. Lilia Maria D’Souza, of the Xavier Centre of Historical Research, was invaluable in helping me to locate Xavier in the [Jesuit] archives. The many people who generously shared their ‘stories’ of Goa’s patron saint with me not only helped give life to my project on death, but kept me in touch with what really mattered. Finally, the close friendships of Rukshana, Naz, Ricard, and Rhea, Heta and Rajesh and Sangeeta made my experience of living in Goa unforgettable.

The guidance of Professors Tom Patterson, Niyi Akinnaso, and Peter Rigby and the financial support of a Future Faculty Fellowship from Temple University provided a nurturing environment to initially pursue graduate studies in anthropology. Here I thank Jason S. Greenberg for exploring the visual with me and Meena Khandelwal for making my first visit to Goa possible. Together, the professors and graduate students affiliated with the Joint Program in Anthropology and History at the University of Michigan provided a vibrant intellectual community that continued, albeit in a different form, at Columbia University. Most of all, I would like to thank the members of my dissertation committee at Columbia University for their scholarly depth and expertise: Professors Nicholas Dirks, Brinkley Messick, Partha Chatterjee, Sanjay Subrahmaniyam, and Gauri Viswanathan. A special thanks to Nick for being my adviser and introducing me to the field of historical anthropology and to Brinkley for teaching me to see the richness of ethnographic description. The Graduate School of Arts and Sciences and a Morton H. Fried Memorial Fellowship at Columbia University provided funds to support the writing-up phase of the dissertation. Remaining mistakes are my own.

My parents provided love and support throughout this entire process. Nor would the completion of this book have been possible without the infamous ‘Downtown Dissertation Writing Group’ in New York city: Ilana Feldman, Rachel Heiman, Mani Limbert, Brian Mooney, and Karen Strassler; they collectively provide much needed coffee, warmth, and support during the writing phase (2000–4). I give a special thanks to Marco, who will always remind me of Goa and who patiently stood by me when I was trying to complete the seemingly impossible task of finishing a never-ending dissertation, and who dared to take me on an adventure to South Africa, one I am still living.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Here in Johannesburg, I would like to thank numerous friends and colleagues associated with Wits University and WISER (Wits Institute for Social and Economic Research), my intellectual space and home: Deborah Posel, Achille Mbembe, Isabel Hofmeyr, Sarah Nuttall, Ashlee Nesper, Jon Hyslop, Irma du Plessis, Michael Titlestad, Julia Hornberger, Jon Soske, and Ronit Frenkel.

Special thanks go to Craig MacKenzie, who helped me edit an unmanageable thesis into a concise book, Hannah Chapelle Wojciechowski for her continued interest in my work, Nandini Chaturvedula and Anjali Arondekar for their expert advice, and, finally, to Michael Pearson who always had faith in my little [big] book. I want to thank my editor Emma Brennan at Manchester University Press for seeing the potential in my work, and for her patience along the editorial process, the anonymous reviewer of my manuscript appointed by Manchester, and finally the editors for the Studies in Imperialism series, which gave my book a home. Lastly, I want to thank Juan for helping me to see the nuances of words and images, and Padma for making me smile every day.

For the illustrations included in this book, I have made every effort to trace the holder of the copyright to this remarkable set of posters that were commissioned in conjunction with Xavier’s past expositions. I have also searched the archives in Goa for copies and/or additional information on them but to no avail. Presumably, these posters were sold or distributed during the days of his expositions. I would like to thank the owner of the small photo and frame shop in Panjim who in September 1999 took an interest in my research and sold me the few copies he had available.
Figure 1  Souvenir, St Francis Xavier Exposition, 1952