Acknowledgements

This book has been decidedly longer in preparation than anyone anticipated, and for their seemingly inexhaustible patience and unshakeable confidence in its ultimate appearance I want to express my profound gratitude to Jeffrey Richards, the Series Editor, and Emma Brennan, MUP's Acquisitions Editor. The book I had planned writing is entirely different in scope, content and argument from what emerged – I know that it has benefited from this longer gestation period. Illness partly interrupted my progress, but so did other books, which I think gave me shrewder insights into drinking habits.

I have incurred other numerous debts in researching and writing the book which I am grateful to knowledge. John Greenaway provided keen insight into Chapter 9; Jane McGregor kindly lent me her dissertation, a perceptive study of Nottingham's pivotal position as the 'binge capital of Britain'; and Victor Bailey suggested sources on the 1950s, while Tim Hall and Jane McGregor generously guided me through the ever-expanding literature on drinking habits in the era of 'binge' Britain.

Two scholars immeasurably improved this book. Trevor Lloyd, my dissertation adviser so long ago at the University of Toronto, mentor and cherished friend, scrutinized every chapter, bringing his deep knowledge of modern Britain to bear on what I wrote. He continues to amaze me with his acuity, breath of knowledge and ability to assimilate new ideas. I regard Trevor as the quintessential scholar, historian and author. Another life-long and precious friend is David Fahey. Far more facile with the computer than me, he gave me new references, answered queries and suggested topics worth exploring. No one could have been more selfless than David in critiquing my prose. Like Trevor, he read every chapter and all the various revisions that emerged. Looking back over my career, these two scholars, mentors and intimate friends – more than anyone else – have been responsible for my development as a historian.

I want to thank the following for permission to consult private records: Nicholas Redman (Whitbread Archives); Kenneth Thomas (Heineken UK Archives); Diana Lay (National Brewery Centre); Glasgow University Archives Services; and David Wilson (British Pub and Beer Association). For information about The Tap, Pease Pottage, I would like to thank Chloe Johnson (Leamington Spa Art Gallery & Museum).

Shannon Conlon and Deborah Williams continually amazed me with their ability to locate key sources and order them through Interlibrary Loan. Patient and creative, they enormously facilitated my research.

I am also pleased to thank former executives of the brewing industry who participated in oral history interviews: Tony Avis and James Lloyd (both Bass Charrington); Stuart Aitken, former Sales Director with Whitbread Beer Company; and Neal Hyde, former chairman of Hydes' Anvil Brewery.

I am grateful to Missouri State University, which awarded me a sabbatical in which to write some of the manuscript and a research grant to travel to Britain.

As I have been writing about alcohol in Britain for some thirty years, I am acutely aware of change. Many brewing archives have closed, with some sources alas lost. Where possible, I have identified the current repository holding the archives; otherwise, I have recorded where I originally consulted them.

David W. Gutzke