This book would not have been possible without the support of so many friends and colleagues over the years. I had no intention of becoming an academic, and I would not be in this profession without the support and encouragement of my undergraduate and MA professors at Brown University, particularly Elizabeth J. Bryan, Ravit Reichman, and Geoffrey R. Russom, whose mentorship continues to this day. I am thankful for the good friends I made during my MA at Brown, especially Corey McEleney and Jay Zysk. The convivial yet rigorous intellectual environment of the University of Connecticut's Medieval Studies Program is the best place I can imagine to write a dissertation, and I am grateful for the ongoing support of all my UConn friends and colleagues, particularly Brandon W. Hawk and Andrew Pfrenger.

I thank UConn's Humanities Institute for awarding me a fellowship in 2011–12 that allowed me to finish writing my dissertation free of teaching obligations, and I thank my fellow UCHI fellows that year for their input and friendship. C. David Benson, Mary Burke, Robert Hasenfratz, and Clare Costley King'oo offered invaluable guidance during my PhD and while I was on the job market. I remain grateful to Brendan Kane for his friendship at UConn and beyond, and for reading, commenting, and thoughtfully discussing many drafts of this book project.

I have been lucky to have written this book in the supportive environment of the University of Mississippi's Department of English, and I am grateful to the many friends and colleagues here — especially Magali Armillas-Tisceyra, Erin Drew, Cristin Ellis, Melissa Ginsburg, Derrick A. Harriell, Gregory Heyworth, Steven Justice, Chris Offutt, Daniel O'Sullivan, Peter Reed, Daniel Stout, Ian Whittington, and Caroline Wigginton — who have made living and working in Oxford such a pleasure.

The A. W. Mellon Postdoctoral Fellowship in Medieval Studies at the University of Notre Dame's Medieval Institute generously provided funding that allowed me to finish writing this book in 2015–16. I am grateful to the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the University of Notre Dame, and the Medieval Institute for this opportunity, as well as to my department chair, Ivo Kamps, and to the College of Liberal Arts at the University of Mississippi for supporting this research leave. At Notre Dame, this project benefitted enormously from the friendship and collegiality of everyone in the Medieval Institute, especially Chris Abram, Kathryn Kerby-Fulton, Tim Machan, Amy Mulligan, and John Van Engen, and all the current and former MI graduate students who became my good friends over the year.

Both my work and life have been enriched in so many ways by fantastic friends in the fields of Anglo-Saxon and Celtic studies. I am particularly grateful to Lori Garner, Shannon Godlove, Ben Guy, Georgia Henley, David F. Johnson, Johanna Kramer, Vicky McAlister, Joey McMullen, M. J. Toswell, Patrick Wadden, and Eric Weiskott; and to Thomas A. Bredehoft and Charles Insley for reading and commenting on drafts of this project. This book would be much poorer without the years-long friendship and mentorship of Elaine Treharne and of Paul Russell, and I am grateful to them and to Andrew Rabin for their incredibly detailed and thoughtful comments on the penultimate draft of this book at the Mellon Colloquium at the University of Notre Dame's Medieval Institute in January 2016.

I could not have finished writing this book without the friendship and encouragement of Joshua Byron Smith and our writing group that came at just the right time. I am so grateful to Josh for his continued support, advice and collaboration. My greatest intellectual debt is to my dissertation director and continued mentor, Fred Biggs. I am so lucky to have worked with him and to have him as a continued supporter and sounding board. He is responsible for every best part of the scholar I am today (and for none of the mistakes!). Finally, this book would not exist without the continued support of my family. I am so grateful to my wonderfully patient husband Tom Brady, who has lived with this project for its entirety, and to Murphy Brady, for unflagging support and encouragement. My sister Sarah Alender and my parents, Ken and Sue Alender, are the ones who encouraged a life-long love of reading and learning. This book would not exist without them, and it is dedicated to them in thanks and love.
