Notes on contributors

Ian W. Archer is Associate Professor of History at Keble College, Oxford. He is the author of a number of books and articles on the social, cultural and political history of early modern London, and in recent years has developed interests in chronicling and civic memory.

Paul Cavill is Lecturer in Early Modern British History at the University of Cambridge and a fellow of Pembroke College. He has written about early Tudor parliaments and relations between Church and state, and is currently studying the constitutional and jurisdictional issues of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries.

Alexandra Gajda is Associate Professor of History at the University of Oxford and John Walsh Fellow and Tutor in History at Jesus College. She has written on the political history of Elizabethan England, and is working on parliament and the Reformation in the sixteenth century.

Simon Healy is Senior Research Fellow at the History of Parliament Trust. He has published extensively on political, social, religious and economic history in the early Stuart period, and is currently writing a study of English crown finances between 1580 and 1640.

Paulina Kewes is Professor of English Literature at the University of Oxford and a fellow of Jesus College. She has published widely on drama, history and politics from the Renaissance to the eighteenth century, and is working on the issue of royal succession in Tudor and Stuart England.

Peter Lake is University Distinguished Professor of History, Professor of the History of Christianity and Martha Rivers Ingram Chair of History at Vanderbilt University. He has written prolifically on the religious, political and cultural history of Elizabethan and early Stuart England.

Scott Lucas is Professor of English Literature at the Citadel, the Military College of South Carolina. He is the author of the monograph 'A Mirror for Magistrates' and the Politics of the English Reformation and of a number of articles on early and mid-Tudor literature, history and culture.

Noah Millstone is Birmingham Fellow in early modern history at the University of Birmingham. He has written on manuscript circulation and political thinking in early Stuart England, and is currently working on the political and religious history of early seventeenth-century Europe.

Jason Peacey is Professor of Early Modern British History at University College London. Having published on print and political culture in the seventeenth century, he is now working on a microhistory relating to litigation in early modern Britain and on Anglo-Dutch relations between 1609 and 1689.

Paul Seaward holds a British Academy and Wolfson Research Professorship at the History of Parliament Trust, and was previously Director of the Trust. He writes about the history of parliament generally, and, with Martin Dzelzainis, is general editor of the Oxford edition of the works of Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon.