Notes on contributors

Derek Chambers is a doctoral student at the School of Applied Social Studies in University College Cork (UCC) and Director of Programmes and Policy at ReachOut Ireland. He has co-authored a number of peer-reviewed publications and book chapters, including Understanding Irish Suicide(s) (with Kieran Keohane, in Collision Culture: Transformations in Everyday Life in Ireland, by Keohane and Kuhling, 2004). Derek previously worked in the public sector with the Irish Health Service Executive and he was project manager and lead author of Ireland's National Strategy for Action on Suicide Prevention, 2005–2014. During his time with the HSE, Derek also project managed Ireland's first state-funded public mental health awareness campaign, Your Mental Health. Derek left the state sector in 2009 to oversee the delivery of ReachOut.com, an online mental health resource for young people aimed at promoting a broad-based model of mental health literacy at a population level, informed by the approaches outlined within the discipline of critical psychiatry.

Fiona Dukelow is a lecturer in social policy at the School of Applied Social Studies, UCC. Her recent research has focused on welfare state change, the impact of economic crisis and the evolution of neoliberalism. She is co-author, with Mairéad Considine, of Irish Social Policy: A Critical Introduction (Gill and Macmillan, 2009), and has recently co-edited Defining Events: Power, Resistance and Identity in Twenty-First-Century Ireland (Manchester University Press, 2015) with Rosie Meade, and The Irish Welfare State in the Twenty First Century: Challenges and Change (Palgrave, 2016) with Mary P. Murphy.

Claire Edwards is a lecturer in the School of Applied Social Studies, UCC. Her teaching and research interests are in the areas of disability rights, urban regeneration and the relationship between research and policy. She has published widely in a range of journals, including BioSocieties, Health & Place, Disability and Society, Sociology, Critical Social Policy and Urban Studies. Her most recent research has explored disabled people's encounters with the criminal justice system as victims of crime, and the dynamics and barriers of access to justice.

Eluska Fernández is a lecturer in the School of Applied Social Studies, UCC. Her teaching and research interests include contemporary discourses of health, the politics of public health and tobacco control. She has published on the topics of smoking, the smoking ban in Ireland and more recently, on vaping, in journals such as Social Theory and Health and the Irish Journal of Sociology. Currently, she is undertaking an ethnographic study of vaping in Cork city.

Cliona Loughnane is a doctoral candidate at the School of Applied Social Studies, UCC and Policy and Research Manager at the Irish Heart Foundation. Her doctoral work focuses on the increasing role which corporate interests play in the development of public health policy, particularly the influence of the food industry on anti-obesity policy. She has worked for over a decade in public affairs and policy roles in health and disability not-for-profit organisations. She holds a BA in English and History, HDip in Social Policy and MEconSc in European Economics and Public Affairs.

Órla O'Donovan is based in the School of Applied Social Studies, UCC. She has a long-standing interest in questions about the tensions between democracy and expertise, and how the production and use of science and technology for public purposes can be promoted. In recent years, her concern with the search for radically alternative ways of living, beyond the alienations of patriarchy and consumer capitalism, has led her to explore the promises of the commons as a route to what Ivan Illich referred to as a 'convivial society'. Together with Mary McDermott and Tom O'Connell, in 2014 she co-edited a Special Supplement to the Community Development Journal called 'Commons Sense – New thinking about an old idea'.

Ciara O'Dwyer is the Co-ordinator of a European Project on The Human Rights of Older Persons and Long-term Care, being carried out by the European Network of National Human Rights Institutions (ENNHRI) and funded by the European Commission. Her primary research interests are on care policies for older people and the social inclusion of older people in society. She completed her PhD (Trinity College Dublin) in 2012 on the use of regulations to monitor the quality of residential care settings for older people in Ireland and its impact on older people themselves. Before joining ENNHRI, she was a Post-Doctoral Research Fellow in the Collegio Carlo Alberto, Turin, Italy. She also worked as a Research Fellow at the Social Policy and Ageing Research Centre (SPARC), Trinity College Dublin, where she led and assisted with projects in the area of home care, community-based services, the quality of life of older people in residential care and the contribution of older people to society.

Lindsay Prior is a Professor Emeritus in the Centre of Excellence for Public Health at Queen's University, Belfast, UK. Recent publications have included journal papers on physical activity and health (Social Science & Medicine), architecture and health, and end-of-life care (Sociology of Health & Illness). He also contributes regularly to edited collections, dictionaries and encyclopaedias on social research methods and he is author and editor of the four-volume collection, Using Documents and Records in Social Research (Sage, 2011), and Using Documents in Social Research (Sage, 2003). He is currently writing a book on exploratory methods in social research. His most recent publication is entitled 'In praise of small N, and of N =1 in particular', Critical Public Health, 2016.

Kevin Ryan is a lecturer at the School of Political Science and Sociology, National University of Ireland, Galway. His research focuses on degrees of freedom, that is, arenas of practice which are formed by historically constituted conditions of possibility and relations of power. Kevin is the author of Social Exclusion and the Politics of Order (Manchester University Press, 2007) and co-editor (with Mark Haugaard) of Political Power: The Development of the Field (Barbara Budrich, 2012). His articles have been published in Childhood, Critical Horizons, Critical Sociology, the International Journal of Sport Policy and Politics and The Journal of Political Power.

Michelle Share is a Senior Research Fellow at the School of Education, Trinity College Dublin. Her doctoral thesis 'Risk, responsibility and choice: food and eating in Irish second level schools' examined food provision and education issues amongst students, teachers, parents and caterers in different school types in Northern Ireland/Republic of Ireland using a Foucauldian governmentality perspective. Michelle has also designed and conducted large-scale programme evaluations in child and youth settings in relation to nutrition, smoking, mental health and school health education. She has researched and published on dietary and food issues amongst women dieters, asylum seekers, older people in community settings, and children and young people. She is currently leading a research project on grandparental childcare, with a focus on transnational care practices in the Polish community in Ireland.

Perry Share is Head of School of Business and Social Sciences, Institute of Technology, Sligo. He is a sociologist with diverse research interests, most of which can ultimately be traced to a concern for the operation of language and discourse: these include the relationship between evidence, policy and practice; professionalisation and the social professions; the sociology of food and eating; and intertextuality in academic writing. He is the co-author of A Sociology of Ireland, and co-editor of Applied Social Care, both bestselling Irish social science texts, as well as numerous papers, chapters, articles and posters among three decades of academic work in Ireland and Australia.

Joanne Wilson is the Managing Editor of the Cochrane Developmental, Psychosocial and Learning Problems Group, currently based at the School of Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work at the Queen's University Belfast.