This book owes a great deal to the community of scholars who research, discuss and disagree over the events and interpretations it examines. Paul Dixon, Christopher Norton and Mike Cunningham have been hugely helpful over many years. They may not agree with my conclusions, but if they do not, they should have done a better job of convincing me of the alternatives. The Irish Politics Specialist Group of the Political Studies Association has long been a forum for the debates which have influenced my thoughts on the peace process. I am extremely grateful to my co-convenor, Alan Greer, and a wide cast of people who have made academic life more enjoyable and enlightening. This includes, amongst others: Máire Braniff, Feargal Cochrane, Aaron Edwards, Cathy Gormley-Heenan, Will Hazelton, Tom Hennessey, Stephen Hopkins, Jim McAuley, Martin McCleery, Shaun McDaid, Marisa McGlinchey, Catherine McGlynn, Cillian McGrattan, Henry Patterson, Graham Spencer, Jon Tonge, Graham Walker and Sophie Whiting. I also owe a significant debt to all the politicians and officials who agreed to be interviewed over the years for my research, some of whom are quoted in this book, but all of whom helped me to clarify my thoughts on the topic.

I have been extremely fortunate in working with a great group of people and students in the Department of History, Politics and War Studies at the University of Wolverhampton and I am grateful for the support of the university's Centre for Historical Research, which provided the sabbatical that helped me complete the book.

Good friends and family have been a welcome distraction from the process of completing this work. Thanks to Siobhain O'Kane; Jackie and Danny Doherty; Jane Anthony and Kevin Allsobrook; Peter, Judy, Chris and Karen Anthony; Brian, Brendan and Tony Walsh; Dennis Roxborough; Linton Williams; Martin Perry and Paul Maguire. In Worcester, thanks to Mark and Kay Weaver, Matt Butler, Lisa Tye, Sarah and Mark Poole and the Redhill Dropouts for the beers and banter.

This book has taken too long to come to fruition, and I am grateful to Tony Mason, Jon de Peyer and Rob Byron of Manchester University Press (MUP) for their patience and keeping faith with the project.

My main debt, however, is to my lovely wife Bridget, and my children, Thea, Niall and Dylan. That they did not share my obsession with the peace process makes their toleration of it all the more generous.

Finally, I would like to also thank all the above for agreeing to buy this book in hardback; there's a few sold, MUP.
