ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

My gratitude goes out to all those who have been involved – whether willingly or not – in the creation of this book over the past few years. It all started somewhat fortuitously, in 1998, towards the end of my undergraduate studies at the University of Western Australia, when I decided to formulate a personal question for my final research essay: how did Indigenous cultures around the world measure and relate to the concept of time? (I was secretly questioning whether I wanted to be a historian or an anthropologist.) The paper ended up being marked by Julian Cobbing, a visiting professor from Rhodes University in Grahamstown, South Africa. Whilst the mark he gave me did not suggest that he was overly impressed with my take on the subject, the feedback I received and the subsequent conversations we had during this period inspired me to continue with my history studies; thus, in effect, sowing some of the seeds which have led to the writing of this book. If one day he were to read it, it is my hope that he will find some improvement on that original essay. I am also grateful to Norman Etherington, who supervised the Honours dissertation that emerged from that essay, providing ideas and suggestions for its future development; and to Iain Brash, who offered valuable counsel. Gratitude also goes out to my friend and fellow student at the time, Vaarunika Dharmapala, for her sharp and humorous critiques – then and over the following years. For generous and fruitful conversations about clocks, calendars and all things temporal during this period, I wish to thank Maureen Perkins, whose own work on time has been a significant influence on the writing of this book.

In 2002, after living and working as a tour-guide in Namibia for some time, I resolved to move back to Australia to undertake a Ph.D. at the University of Melbourne. My sincere thanks go out to David Philips (who is sadly no longer with us) and Julie Evans who jointly supervised me in this endeavour. Pointing me in many of the right directions, David's guidance and humour, and Julie's insights into settler-colonialism, have been absolutely invaluable. For useful comments, feedback and vital encouragement during this time I am also grateful to Elizabeth Elbourne, Patricia Grimshaw, David Goodman, Zoë Laidlaw, Paul Maylam, Shurlee Swain, Andrekos Varnava and Patrick Wolfe.

2002–3, I was assisted by several generous people, including the late Michael Berning, and Jackson Zweliyanikima Vena, who helped me to navigate the valuable records at the Cory Library in Grahamstown; Sandy Shell (African Studies Library, University of Cape Town) for assistance with the James Stewart papers; Jaco van der Merwe, principal archivist (who knows his way around the repository like no other) at the Cape Town Archives Repository; and the staff who assisted me at the South African National Library in Cape Town, at the Australian National Archives and at the Public Records Office of Victoria.

I respectfully thank Auntie Joy Murphy Wandin, Uncle Colin Walker and Uncle Albert Mullett for giving their permission to quote excerpts from their interviews in the 'Mission Voices' project; and the Koorie Heritage Trust for assisting with the permission process. Jeffrey Peires and Sally Schramm at the Cory Library assisted me with image permissions, as did Larry Manuel at the Wilmington Institute Library and the staff at the Pictures Collection of the State Library of Victoria. I have endeavoured without success to trace copyright-owners for permission to reproduce figure 6.5 (the Lovedale clock-tower) and figure 7.4 (Greenwich Observatory). Whilst I have acknowledged sources in the List of illustrations, I invite the owners of these two photographs to contact me should they wish to claim copyright. Much gratitude also goes out to Zoe Tame for generously helping with the laborious creation of all of the maps and figure 7.3.

A great part of the research for this book was undertaken thanks to the support of a Melbourne University International Research Scholarship, as well as to financial support to undertake overseas research from the Arts Faculty and the University. A Publication Subsidy Grant from the Arts Faculty and the School of Social and Political Sciences at the University of Melbourne provided funds to cover expenses related to image permissions. Sections of an earlier version of Chapter 3 have appeared in Time and Society, 20:1 (2011), and are reproduced by kind permission of Sage Publications. I am particularly grateful to John MacKenzie and the whole production team at Manchester University Press for their helpfulness, kindness and patience in preparing this publication over the course of the past two years; to Corinne Orde for copy-editing and proofing the typescript; and to Leonie Twentymen-Jones for creating the index.

On a more personal note, my gratitude goes to family and friends who have expressed interest, shown patience and curiosity and shared conversations with me about the subject of the book – which has often been of greater comfort than they might realise. Beth Dickerson offered her warm hospitality in Grahamstown during my research there; and Sheila Meintjies and her lovely family welcomed me during my sojourn in Johannesburg. Those who read chapters and drafts of the manuscript provided invaluable comments, criticisms and suggestions: I am grateful to Paula Geldenhuys, Margaret Geldenhuys, David McGinnis, Julie Evans, Adam Ferguson and Lucy Cahill. Our benevolent landlady, Ann Brown, also deserves my thanks for keeping our rent down to reasonable levels (despite current trends in Melbourne), thus enabling me to dedicate that extra bit of time to writing. (Time is money, as they say.) Lastly, I am deeply appreciative of the comments by the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript, who provided valuable suggestions for its improvement. Any errors or omissions are, of course, my own.

But above all, I want to express my most profound gratitude to the people who actually made this book possible: to my dear partner, Lucy Cahill, whose patience and moral support has been saintly and who has put up with the book (and me) for a surprisingly long time; to my parents, Paula Geldenhuys and Carlo Nanni, for making all this possible in the first place – and to my mother in particular, for constant encouragement over the years. And finally, to my wise grandmother, Margaret Geldenhuys, whose love, patience and support has been boundless ever since I can remember. Thank you.
