ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

For a historian, it's important to start at the beginning, and Married to the empire had its beginnings as a doctoral dissertation at the University of Pennsylvania. The history department at Penn was a wonderful place to undertake graduate studies, providing the researcher with both intellectual stimulation and material support. I am especially grateful to David Ludden, who enthusiastically encouraged my interest in South Asian history; to Lynn Hunt, who introduced me to cultural history; to Tom Childers, who encouraged me to think about writing history and teaching history; and to the late Jack Reece, who helped me to put politics back into my history. My advisor Lynn Hollen Lees has unfailingly provided excellent advice on matters intellectual, professional and personal. It was she who first encouraged my interest in the British empire and thus opened up for me the burgeoning field of imperial history in which I have become so engrossed. Lynn read this work in its first incarnation as a dissertation, as well as in its present form. Her comments have been invaluable in shaping this book, and her encouragement has been invaluable in shaping me as a historian.

Married to the empire could not have been written without the assistance and support of numerous institutions and individuals. Various parts of the research for and the writing of this book were supported by a Benjamin Franklin Fellowship from the University of Pennsylvania, a Bernadotte Schmitt Grant from the American Historical Association, and a Summer Fellowship and a Research and Study Grant from Temple University.

Librarians at the University of Pennsylvania, especially Van Pelt Library's interlibrary-loan staff, and those at the Paley Library at Temple University, the Oriental and India Office collections of the British Library, the Centre for South Asian Studies at the University of Cambridge and the Imperial War Museum have cheerfully and efficiently helped this project along.

Morris Vogel, acting dean of the College of Liberal Arts at Temple University, and Richard Immerman, chair of the history department there, have gone out of their way to support the writing of this book, and I am extremely grateful to them. Frank de Caro and Rosan Jordan generously shared with me their research on the British in South Asia.

For their comments on various parts of this book, and their encouragement in other ways, I am grateful also to Howard Spodek, Barbara Day, Harriet Freidenreich, Frances Gouda, Seth Koven, Angela Woollacott, Margot Finn, the members of my dissertation writing group at the University of Pennsylvania, especially Savita Nair, Bob Nichols, and Tamara Hudek, and the members of the British studies group of the Delaware Valley.

Writing a book is a solitary enterprise, though an author is often dependent on the kindness of others in assisting with competing responsibilities. My teaching assistants at Temple University, Laura Murphy, Susan Morse, Mary Zambrana and Bob Wintermute, helped me negotiate my first years as a professor. My sons Joey and Danny are a constant source of joy, but I am grateful to my parents, Imelda and Vincent Procida, and to my in-laws, Rose and Frank Moramarco, for undertaking child care duties, as well as to a small army of babysitters who freed me to research and write this book. My husband Glenn Moramarco has cheerfully endured my transformation from tax lawyer to historian, managed the domestic front while I was abroad, and helped me navigate the shoals of academia. Married to the empire is dedicated to him.
