ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book began with a Spencer Foundation Small Grant to spend summer 1997 in Britain researching the education of Indians there during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Thereafter it grew into a more general examination of social rank in the colonial encounter in the United Kingdom. The University of Akron funded further archival research in England in 1999 and 2004. My work draws on numerous collections, and I am grateful to many archivists for their help in my research: in particular, the staffs of the Oriental and India Office Collection of the British Library; the National Archives of the United Kingdom; the Special Collections of University College Library, London; the University of Birmingham Library Special Collections; the University of Chicago Special Collections, and the Council for Legal Education; Dr John Nicholls, Director of Recruitment and Training at the London City Mission, for providing me with publications and minutes of that organisation; Michael Underwood for showing me Indian students' application forms to St John's College, Cambridge, and Sarah Akers and John Ball at the University of Akron's Bierce Library for their tireless efforts to acquire material through interlibrary loan. The Gilchrist Education Trust, the University of Birmingham Library, and the Institute for Advanced Legal Studies have kindly granted permission to cite material from their collections, and material from the India Office Records and United Kingdom National Archives are cited under the rules of Crown copyright.

I am also indebted to friends, colleagues, and relatives. Shelley Baranowski, Michael Carley, Jeffrey Cox and Stephen Harp commented on my manuscript, and provided me with many useful suggestions. My parents, Arthur and Betty Wainwright, have been a constant support, logistically, emotionally, and intellectually, as I have refined my ideas and pursued my research. My greatest debt is to my spouse, Christine Wainwright, who in living and travelling with me as I have researched and written this book, has entered into the world I have been studying. I have benefited incalculably from her knowledge, repeated manuscript readings, and partnership in life as we have raised a family during my years of work on this book. Finally I must thank my children, Elizabeth and Alexandra, for reminding me constantly that this book was not the most important thing in my life.
