Acknowledgements

In putting together a work like this some debts inevitably accumulate. I would like to acknowledge the assistance I received from many institutions and individuals, including the staff of the following archives and record offices: the National Archives of Ireland, Dublin; the National Archives, London; the Public Records Office of Northern Ireland, Belfast; the Military Archives at Cathal Brugha Barracks, Dublin; the Linen Hall Library, Belfast; the Queen's University of Belfast, Main Library; the National Archives, Maryland; the John F. Kennedy Archives, Boston; the National Library of Ireland, Dublin and, finally, our excellent library at Dublin City University. I am also very grateful to those who agreed to be interviewed for my research.

This book received financial support from the Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences Book Publication Scheme at Dublin City University. I have greatly appreciated the support of my colleagues in the School of Law and Government, and the wider community at DCU, especially our Head of School, Professor Gary Murphy, Faculty Dean, Professor John Doyle, and university President, Professor Brian MacCraith. DCU's Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction (IICRR) has also been a major resource for facilitating and disseminating research.

I appreciate very much my friends and colleagues Dr Brian Murphy, Dr Rob Kevlihan, Professor John Doyle and Professor Eileen Connolly who took the time to read parts of the manuscript and provide expert comment. While standard formulae dictate that I should relieve them of responsibility for any errors that remain and claim these slip-ups as my own, I will privately hold them to account should a blunder have escaped their scrutiny. I am also indebted to my old friend, Paul McGuill, for the endless hours discussing topics connected with the focus of this book. Special thanks are due to Dr David McCullagh who took the time to read the entire manuscript in advance of publication and to offer constructive feedback.

My wife Karolina devoted much time (and even more patience) reading earlier drafts of the book and debating the issues with me. Had she read the small print of our marriage contract she would have seen it included an obligation to read all major written works in advance of publication.

I would like to express my appreciation to the anonymous reviewers for their constructive comments and to the production staff at Manchester University Press that ushered the manuscript through the publication process. These include Diane Wardle, Danielle Shepherd, Alun Richards, Chris Hart and Robert Byron. I also wish to thank Tony Mason, senior commissioning editor, for his assistance, not least for his forbearance in waiting for me to complete the manuscript.

I shall always be grateful to my mother, Deirdre, and my sister, Caoilfhionn. Alas, my father, Brendan, my grandmother, Kathleen, and my aunt, Medb are no longer around to celebrate this book. I know they would have derived immense satisfaction and happiness from seeing it in print. They encouraged my love of learning and are present in everything I do.

Finally, and most importantly, I would like to pay tribute to my wife Karolina and to our daughter, Gaia, without whom life is unimaginable. As with all my other endeavours, this book is dedicated to them.
