Every work of historical production is in some sense a collective enterprise, and it is my pleasurable duty to acknowledge the help of scholars, friends and institutions.

The thesis on which this book was based was ably supervised by Michael Dockrill, whose incisive criticisms were invariably tempered by a seemingly endless fund of goodwill. I was encouraged and advised by Lawrence Freedman, John Gooch, David Killingray and Peter Marshall at a time when all seemed 'dark and doubtful'. My interest in imperial and African history was inspired by the teaching of John MacKenzie; and his friendship, hospitality and constructive criticism have been valued ever since. Tony Henderson and Dominic Omissi each read the entire typescript and discussed my work with me countless times. Paul Addison, Stephen Church, Monika Göbel, Tim Hitchcock, Maria-Sophia Quine and Tim Wales read individual chapters and made many fruitful suggestions. My colleagues during my short stay at Edinburgh University were always helpful, especially Tom Barron, Ian Wei and Paul Bailey. One of the pleasures of working at the Public Record Office is the opportunity it provides for the exchange of ideas with other scholars: the searching questions and impressive erudition of John Ferris and David French exposed my own ignorance and encouraged me to greater efforts. Joshua Landis discussed the French Mandate in Syria with me several times, more for my benefit than his. Jeff Rudd generously shared his research on Transjordan and Palestine with me, and Douglas Johnson did the same for the Sudan. David Arnold gave me unpublished work and some contemporary articles, and wrote a brief critique of my entire project from which I learned much. Several people drew my attention to source material I might otherwise have missed: among them were Tony Gorst, Keith Jeffery, Nick Cull, Jane Platt, Charles Smith and Wesley Wark. Alison Pilz, Bernie Branfield, Rob Procter and Paul Temple had to live not only with me but with air policing: I admire their endurance on both counts. Charlotte Devereux read some of the typescript and sustained me in countless other ways.

I greatly benefited from the chance to present my work for discussion at seminars and conferences: in particular the Imperial History and Military History Seminars at the Institute of Historical Research; the Tuesday Club at the London School of Economics; the Philosophy of History Seminar at SOAS, London; and the Imperial Policing Conference held at Birkbeck College, London in May 1988. For this I am grateful to the participants (too numerous to mention by name) and to the organizers, among whom were David Anderson, Brian Bond, Freda Harcourt, Scott Lucas, Andrew Porter and Brian Holden Reid.

As a postgraduate I was given every encouragement by the Department of War Studies at Kings' College, London. The staff at the Public Record Office in Kew, the Liddell Hart Centre for Military Archives, the Imperial War Museum and the RAF Museum at Hendon were most helpful. All intellectual life has a material basis, and I am grateful to the States of Jersey without whose funds this project could not have been undertaken.

The agreeable surroundings of Nuffield College, Oxford, eased the task of checking the typescript and proofs.

Advice is there to be ignored, and if I have failed to make best use of the help I have received, the fault is entirely my own.
