Notes on contributors

Emmanuelle Avril is Professor of Contemporary British Politics and Society at the Sorbonne Nouvelle University, France. Her specialist subject is intra-party democracy, organisational change and mobilisation within the British Labour Party, which has come to include a study of the impact of new technologies on party membership, activism and political participation in general. Other aspects of her research are political leadership, ideology and the rhetoric of political images. Her latest publications include New Technologies, Organizational Change and Governance (Palgrave Macmillan, 2013, co-edited with C. Zumello); Les partis politiques en Grande Bretagne (Armand Colin, 2013, co-written with A. Alexandre-Collier) and Democracy, Participation and Contestation: Civil Society, Governance and the Future of Liberal Democracy (Routledge, 2016, co-edited with J. Neem).

Anne Beauvallet is a Senior Lecturer in British Studies at Toulouse-Jean Jaurès University, France. She received a PhD on the perception of the welfare state by the English public from 1960 to 2001. As a member of the research group Cultures Anglo-Saxonnes, she has published several papers on British education policies in French academic journals such as LISA/LISA e-journal, Observatoire de la société britannique and Revue Française de Civilisation Britannique. She has also published a chapter on 'Truancy and Anti-social Behaviour in England in the late Victorian Era and under New Labour', in Anti-social Behaviour in Britain: Victorian and Contemporary Perspectives, edited by Sarah Pickard (Palgrave, 2014).

Yann Béliard is a Senior Lecturer in British Studies at the Sorbonne Nouvelle University, France. His PhD, completed in 2007 under the supervision of the late François Poirier, dealt with class relations in Hull from 1894 to 1910. Since then he has directed a special issue of the Labour History Review (April 2014) revisiting ‘The Great Labour Unrest, 1911–1914’. His research focuses on British labour in the age of empire, with particular emphasis on workplace struggles, transnational activism and race. Recently he has explored more particularly Sylvia Pankhurst’s Workers’ Dreadnought years and produced a series of notices for the Dictionary of Labour Biography. He is currently working on the edition of a collective volume on British labour and decolonisation.

Anastasia Chartomatsidi is a Modern Greek History PhD candidate at the University of Athens, Greece. Her thesis, entitled ‘The Memory of the 1940s during 2010–2015: Readings of a “Critical Decade” in a Period of Crisis’, focuses on Modern Greek History through the prism of Memory Studies and Public History. She received her Master’s degree from the Department of International History of the London School of Economics and she holds a BA in History and Archaeology. She has also focused on Modern European and Balkan history.

Anna Clark is Professor of History at the University of Minnesota, USA. Her publications include Women’s Silence, Men’s Violence: Sexual Assault in Britain, 1780–1845 (Pandora, 1987); The Struggle for the Breeches: Gender and the Making of the British Working Class (University of California Press, 1995); Scandal: The Sexual Politics of the British Constitution (Princeton University Press, 2003); Desire: A History of European Sexuality (Routledge, 2008) and Alternative Histories of the Self (Bloomsbury Publishing, 2017), as well as articles on sexuality, working-class history and human rights. She is a former editor of the Journal of British Studies. Her new project is ‘Rage against the Machine: Rethinking Individualism and Biopolitics in the British Empire’.

David Evans is a doctoral student based at the University of Strathclyde, UK. He has a BSc (Econ.) Honours Degree in Industrial Relations and Sociology from Cardiff University and an MA degree in Industrial Relations from the University of Warwick. An active trade unionist for most of his working life, he has been elected to numerous lay positions in different unions, and was presented in 1987 with the National Young Member Award by the former National Union of Railwaymen for his services to that union. He is a member of the British Universities Industrial Relations Association, the British Sociological Association and the Scottish Oral History Society. He has presented widely on the subject of breakaway trade unions.

Lewis H. Mates is a Teaching Fellow in the School of Government and International Affairs at Durham University, UK. He has published widely on twentieth-century British political history on subjects such as post-war Conservatism and the Popular Front, and a monograph, The Spanish Civil War and the British Left (I. B. Tauris, 2007). His most recent monograph, The Great Labour Unrest: Rank-and-File Movements and Political Change in the Durham Coalfield, was published by Manchester University Press in 2016. He is currently writing a book on Edwardian anarchism and working on a research project on the teaching of local mining history in post-industrial communities.

Steven Parfitt is a Teaching Fellow at Loughborough University, UK, and his research concerns British and American social and labour history. His first book, Knights Across the Atlantic: The Knights of Labor in Britain and Ireland, was published by Liverpool University Press in 2017. He has written articles on British, American, French, Australian and global history in scholarly journals including the International Review of Social History, Journal of American Studies and Labour History Review, and in newspapers and magazines including The Guardian and Jacobin.

Nick Randall is a Senior Lecturer in British Politics at Newcastle University, UK. His research on the Labour Party forms part of a wider interest in British political parties which includes their ideologies, internal organisation and divisions. He has published his research in a variety of books and journals, including the British Journal of Politics and International Relations, Parliamentary Affairs, British Politics and Political Quarterly. He is currently researching political leadership in the UK with colleagues at the Universities of Exeter and Leeds, and the communication of ‘fear appeals’ in contemporary UK politics.

Eric Shaw is Honorary Research Fellow in the Division of History and Politics Department, University of Stirling, UK. He is a leading expert on the Labour Party, about which he has written extensively. His main publications include: Discipline and Discord in the Labour Party (Manchester University Press, 1988); The Labour Party Since 1979: Conflict and Transformation (Routledge, 1994); The Labour Party since 1945 (Blackwell, 1996); Losing Labour's Soul? New Labour and the Blair Government 1997–2007 (Routledge, 2007); and The Strange Death of Labour Scotland (with Gerry Hassan) (Edinburgh University Press, 2012).

Ophélie Siméon is a Senior Lecturer in British History at the Sorbonne Nouvelle University, France. Her main research interests lie in the social history of early socialism in Britain, with a special focus on everyday life, labour and leisure in Owenite organisations such as unions, intentional communities and co-operatives. Her first monograph, Robert Owen's Experiment at New Lanark: From Paternalism to Socialism, was published by Palgrave Macmillan in 2017.

Fiona Simpkins is a Senior Lecturer in British Contemporary History and Politics at the University Lumière of Lyon, France. Her main areas of research are devolution, Scottish politics and the constitutional debate in Scotland. She has published widely, notably in the journals Revue Française de Civilisation Britannique, Observatoire de la Société Britannique, Etudes Ecossaises and Civilisations.

David Stewart is a Senior Lecturer in History at the University of Central Lancashire, Preston, UK. His research has concentrated on the Labour Party's alliances with the trade-union movement and the co-operative movement. His publications include: The Path to Devolution and Change: A Political History of Scotland under Margaret Thatcher, 1979–1990 (I. B. Tauris, 2009) and The Hidden Alternative: Co-operative Values, Past, Present and Future (United Nations University Press, 2012).

Jeremy Tranmer is a Senior Lecturer at the Nancy site of the University of Lorraine, France, where he teaches Contemporary British History, Politics and Society. He wrote his PhD about the Communist Party of Great Britain and the impact on its strategies and activities of its changing analyses of the Thatcher governments. He has published numerous articles about the history, ideologies and strategies of the British radical left since the 1960s. He has also carried out research into the left's attempts to engage with popular music in the 1970s and 1980s, publishing articles and book chapters about Rock Against Racism, attempts by musicians to support the miners' strike and Red Wedge.