Notes on contributors

Dustin Geeraert holds a PhD in English Literature from the University of Manitoba. As an Institute for the Humanities (UMIH) Research Affiliate, he guest edited a special volume of Scandinavian-Canadian Studies, The Modern Reception of the Medieval Saga of the Sworn Brothers (2019), and has published other studies on the reception of Old Norse literature. He also co-edited a volume of horror fiction inspired by Winnipeg: The Shadow Over Portage and Main (2016). His research has appeared in The Journal of the William Morris Society, The Lovecraft Annual, and Comitatus: A Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies, and has been presented at conferences such as ‘The Middle Ages in the Modern Era’ and ‘The Creative Power of the West Fjords in Icelandic Literature’. He teaches at the University of Manitoba.

Simon Halink studied modern history and German literature in Utrecht and Berlin, and went on to write his PhD thesis at the University of Groningen on the role of Old Norse mythology in Icelandic national culture (c.1820–1918). He is affiliated with the Department of Icelandic and Comparative Cultural Studies of the University of Iceland, where he works as a sessional lecturer and researcher. His current postdoctoral research focuses on the post-medieval reception history of Snorri Sturluson and his ‘after-life’ in the cultural memories of Iceland, Denmark, and Norway.

Kevin J. Harty is Professor of English at La Salle University, where he has served as Chair of the department, as Director of University General Education, and as Special Assistant to the Provost for the University Core. He has published widely on the intersection of film and medieval literature and culture. His books include The Reel Middle Ages (1999), King Arthur on Film (1999), Cinema

Arthuriana: Essays on Arthuriana Film (2002), The Vikings on Film (2011), and The Holy Grail on Film (2015). His Medieval Women on Film is scheduled for publication in 2020. His current project is a study of the Middle Ages as depicted on American, Canadian, and British television from 1946 to the present.

Jón Karl Helgason is Professor in the Department of Icelandic and Comparative Cultural Studies at the University of Iceland. He has published monographs and articles on cultural history, metafiction, and the afterlife of Iceland's medieval literature, and co-edited collections of essays devoted to cultural sainthood, Egil's Saga, and law and literature. His books include Hetjan og höfundurinn (1998), The Rewriting of Njáls Saga (1999), Höfundar Njálu (2001), Echoes of Valhalla (2017), and National Poets, Cultural Saints (co-authored with Marijan Dović, 2017).

Verena Höfig is Assistant Professor in the Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. She holds a PhD in Scandinavian Studies from UC Berkeley. Her research focuses on the intersections of literature, material culture, and social history in Scandinavia from the Viking Age until today. Her forthcoming book, Icelandic Origins – A History of Iceland's First Viking Settler, examines representations of the figure of Ingolf Arnarson, the first Icelander, in the context of (national) identity, nationalism, and memory formation from the first literary texts to the present day. Another recent project has looked at the history of neo-paganism and heathenry in the United States – more specifically on how racist neo-pagan groups use Old Norse mythology for their radical agendas.

Seth Lerer is Distinguished Professor of Literature at the University of California at San Diego. He has published widely on medieval literature, children's literature, the history of the English language, and, most recently, Shakespeare. His book Error and the Academic Self (2002) won the Harry Levin Prize from the American Comparative Literature Association, and his book Children's Literature: A Reader's History from Aesop to Harry Potter (2008) won the National Book Critics Circle Award. He studied Old Norse at Oxford with Ursula Dronke and lived in Iceland in the summer of 1977, an experience remembered in his recent memoir, Prospero's Son (2013).

Emily Lethbridge is Research Lecturer at the Árni Magnússon Institute for Icelandic Research in Reykjavík, Iceland. Her research and teaching focus primarily on the transmission of medieval Icelandic literature in different material contexts (manuscript, landscape and place names, and travel literature on Iceland). She also develops the online Icelandic Saga Map project (<http://sagamap.hi.is>). Her publications include journal articles, book chapters, and edited volumes – most recently, New Studies in the Manuscript Tradition of Njáls saga (co-edited with Svanhildur Óskarsdóttir, 2018) and the Árni Magnússon Institute journal Gripla 29 (2018).

Tim William Machan is Professor of English at the University of Notre Dame. His research and teaching involve both medieval literature and historical linguistics. Focusing on Norse, Latin, and French as well as English, his medieval scholarship has explored the interplay among a variety of theoretical and practical concerns, including the cultural nuances of physical documents and multilingualism. His edition of the Eddic poem ‘The Sayings of Vafthrudnir’ (‘Vafþrúðnismál’) appeared in a second edition in 2008, and his most recent books are What Is English? And Why Should We Care? (2013) and Imagining Medieval English: Language Structures and Theories, 500–1500 (2016).

Amy C. Mulligan is Assistant Professor in Notre Dame’s Department of Irish Language and Literature and Fellow of both the Medieval Institute and the Keough-Naughton Institute for Irish Studies. The primary goal of her research and teaching has been to put medieval Celtic literature into transnational contexts and to demonstrate how these texts inform and are informed by other North Atlantic literary, cultural, and political traditions. With the support of NEH and Fulbright grants, she recently completed a monograph entitled A Landscape of Words: Ireland, Britain, and the Poetics of Irish Space (2019) and has edited, with Else Mundal, the volume Moving Words in the Nordic Middle Ages: Tracing Literacies, Texts and Verbal Communities (2019).

Heather O’Donoghue is Professor of Old Norse at the University of Oxford. She has published widely on the reception of Old Norse-Icelandic literature, and especially on its influence on verse and prose in English, Irish, American, and German literature. Her books include The Genesis of a Saga Narrative: Verse and Prose in Kormaks Saga (1991), Skaldic Verse and the Poetics of Saga

Narrative (2005), and From Asgard to Valhalla: The Remarkable History of the Norse Myths (2008). She is working on a book about the representation of time in the Sagas of Icelanders.

Matthew Scribner received his PhD in medieval English literature at Queen's University in Kingston, Ontario. He has taught there and in the Icelandic Department of the University of Manitoba. He teaches at Carleton University and Algonquin College in Ottawa. His teaching and research focus on the intersections between medieval literature (English and Icelandic) and society.

Angela Sorby is Professor of English and Creative Writing at Marquette University. Her books include a critical study, Schoolroom Poets (2005), Over the River and Through the Wood: An Anthology of Nineteenth-Century American Children's Poetry (co-edited with Karen L. Kilcup, 2013), Poetry and Pedagogy Across the Lifespan (co-edited with Sandra Lee Kleppe, 2018), and three collections of original poetry.

Bergur Þorgeirsson is a literary scholar and a medievalist who studied at the University of Iceland and the University of Gothenburg in Sweden. He works as the director of Snorrastofa, a cultural and medieval research centre in West Iceland dedicated to the Icelandic medieval writer, poet, and chieftain Snorri Sturluson. His research has focused on Old Norse legendary sagas, Eddic poetry, and the reception of Old Norse literature in the late nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries.