Acknowledgements

I am pleased to be able to express my heartfelt thanks to the many kind people who helped make this book a reality. I am grateful to all those who have read and commented on parts of this manuscript, as well as those who have simply listened to me talk about my ideas – and my struggles and triumphs as a writer – for many years. My greatest debt is to Charlie Wright, who is responsible for whatever good qualities I may possess as a scholar. Charlie has always provided meticulous feedback, saved me from errors, and supplied me with the mental energy to develop my ideas (sometimes in very short spaces of time). But the greatest gift Charlie has given me is the example he sets; he has shown me what I should be striving for as a scholar, a teacher, and a mentor. I also wish to thank Renée Trilling, who helped this project through its early days and always had exciting suggestions about new directions it might take.

There are of course many friends and colleagues I would like to thank here, too many to list by name, though I hope they all have a good sense of how very much they are appreciated. I have enjoyed the many benefits of a wonderfully supportive group of colleagues in the English Department at the United States Naval Academy, who have enriched my life and thus my work. In my first years as a new professor, I had the good fortune of sharing the same halls with John Hill and Richard Abels. Their continued friendship (even in their happy states of retirement) has helped me bring this project to completion. For their guidance and enthusiasm, I am forever grateful. I count myself lucky to have the support of many other generous colleagues, many of whom have read and thoughtfully commented on various portions of this book, most especially Thomas Ward, Mike Parker, Audrey Wu Clark, Naida Garcia-Crespo, Derek Handley, Noah Comet, Allyson Booth, Calina Ciobanu, Charlie Nolan, Jason Shaffer, Michelle Allen-Emerson, and Christy Stanlake. Conversations with colleagues and mentors in the field of medieval studies over the years – even some of the most fleeting – have reshaped and sharpened my thinking, ultimately greatly enriching this book. I wish to thank Martin Camargo and Dan Anlezark for their early feedback on the project. I am also grateful to Dave Johnson (who was kind enough to share unpublished work with me), Johanna Kramer, Roy Liuzza, Andrew Rabin, Stacy Klein, Fred Biggs, Nicole Marafioti, Jill Hamilton Clements, Stephane Clark, Shannon Godlove, Lindy Brady, Brandon Hawk, Ben Weber, Stephen Pelle, Stephen Hopkins, and Carl Kears. I am fortunate to have been able to work with and learn from such gracious individuals.

This book has also benefitted from institutional support in the form of Naval Academy Research Council Grants that provided me with steady summer research funding. I am also appreciative for the support I received from United States Naval Academy Faculty Development Funds and Fluegel Funds, which allowed me to travel to various domestic and international conferences to present my work.

I also wish to thank my anonymous readers with Manchester University Press for their constructive suggestions that helped strengthen the manuscript and Meredith Carroll for her editorial support from the very beginning and throughout the publishing process. I also thank Alun Richards for his assistance in guiding the manuscript to print.

I would be remiss if I did not express my sincere thanks to the many midshipmen I have had the pleasure to teach at the United States Naval Academy, who have always been curious as to what I was doing with a clutter of books and notes around my desk. They continue to awe and inspire me and I owe a good deal to their sharp minds and even sharper wits. Second Lieutenant Tom Doughty (USMC), in particular, meticulously (and with more excitement than I could have possibly imagined) checked early drafts of each of my chapters for inconsistencies and transcription errors while he awaited a call-up from Quantico. To the many midshipmen that have brought me such professional purpose and joy over the years – I forever wish you fair winds and following seas.

My deepest gratitude goes to family. My parents, Christopher and Judith Fitzgerald, always taught me to love reading and learning and have shown me steady support and inspiration from the very beginning. In the end, this book is dedicated to my husband, Jeremy, who has lived with this project for its entirety. He is my dearest friend and most trusted sanctuary, a heroic source of patience, love, and support.
