I spent seven great years in the History Department at the University of Warwick, where my doctoral supervisors, Margot Finn, Sarah Hodges, and Catherine Cox motivated and helped to shape my ideas for this project from the start. They turned me into a historian years after Andy Speake first engaged my interest. Hilary Marland, Colin Jones, Mathew Thomson, and Claudia Stein were also always generous with time and knowledge. Sarah-Easterby Smith, Lisa Grant, Debbie Toner, Lydia Plath, Kate Smith, Lucy Allwright, Philippa Hubbard, Jonathan Willis, Helen Cowie, Laura Sangha, and Tracy Horton made postgraduate work a distinctly sociable business.

Mark Harrison and David Arnold examined my PhD thesis, and I am grateful for their engagement, criticism, and ongoing support.

From 2008 to 2010 the staff, postdocs and students at the Centre for the History of Science, Technology and Medicine in Manchester gave me a whole new set of ways to think about disease, health, and medicine. Mick Worboys' practical advice and support was invaluable. Vlad Jankovic, Ian Burney, John Pickstone, Flurin Condrau, and Carsten Timmerman were generous with knowledge, Lyn Schumaker was an inspiration besides that. Rob Kirk, Elizabeth Toon, Duncan Wilson, Vicky Long, Emma Jones, Neil Pemberton, Mike Brown, and Leucha Veneer were great company, moral support, and astute readers in the 'West Wing'.

Molly Rogers read through this entire manuscript, some of it more than once, and provided a reassuring voice of experience just as it seemed impossible. I am glad to say that she has turned from colleague to friend. Her own work helped me to think more creatively, and this book is better for her insights. Sarah Easterby-Smith, too, read the entire manuscript and was, as ever, unreasonably enthusiastic about everything. I promise to reciprocate.

Christopher Hamlin graciously commented and allowed me to grill him on various subjects over food and e-mail. So too, Sally and Colin Foxhall, Ian Henderson, Kate Smith, Neil Pemberton, and Mike Brown read other chapters, and I am very grateful for their suggestions. The ideas and enthusiasm of people working in convict and maritime studies have been a real inspiration; these include Hamish Maxwell-Stewart, Kirsty Reid, Ian Duffield, Tim Causer, and, in particular, Clare Anderson.

Parts of chapters 1, 3, 4 and 6 have benefited enormously from the remarks of anonymous reviewers for Social History of Medicine, Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth Studies and Weather, Climate and Society.

The History of Medicine Committee at the Wellcome Trust generously funded my three years' doctoral research, and the Menzies Centre for Australian Studies and Manchester University awarded me grants to undertake further research. I would therefore also like to thank Kirsten McKenzie, Alison Bashford, Robert Aldrich, Emma Christopher, Frances Clarke, and Samia Hossain for welcoming me to Sydney and making me think long and hard about historical perspectives from the other side of the world.

A huge number of participants at seminars and conferences at King's College London; Wellcome Unit for History of Medicine in Oxford; Sydney University; London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine; the Centre for the History of Medicine at Warwick; Mater Dei Institute, Dublin; Northumbria University; Department of History and Philosophy of Science in Cambridge; University College Dublin; Centre for the Social History of Health and Healthcare, Glasgow; and Institute of Naval Medicine, Gosport have given valuable feedback and asked thoughtful questions about my papers at various stages. Thank you.

It was a joy to spend time working at the Institute of Naval Medicine in Gosport, and I thank Jane Wickenden for her hospitality and generosity with the historical collections, and for her infectious enthusiasm for nineteenth-century naval surgeons. I would also like to acknowledge librarians and archivists at the Wellcome Library, British Library, The National Archives of Great Britain, the National Archives of Ireland, the Maritime Museums in Greenwich, Sydney and Liverpool, the National Libraries of Ireland and Australia, the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland, and the State Archives of New South Wales and Tasmania.

In 2010, Ludmilla Jordanova and Paul Readman in the History Department at King's College London backed me just when I really needed it. I thank them wholeheartedly for their welcome, and their patience, and also Keren Hammerschlag, Richard McKay, Rosie Wall, and the members of the reading group with whom it has been a pleasure to begin new projects.

Above all, I would like to thank Andy, who is a superstar. This book is dedicated to the memory of John and Christine Foxhall, and Dorothy Maureen Butler.
