This project took more time and inner turmoil than I might have imagined. It gave me further reason to contemplate the nature of friendship as the necessary precondition of thinking and writing, or doing sociology at all. I took advice from many people across this time. The draft was read by Tim Dolin, Harry Blatterer, Trevor Hogan, Evelyn Juers, Glyn Davis, Chris Rojek, Keith Tester, John Hall, Izabela Wagner, Jeffrey Alexander; by members of the Bauman family: Aleksandra Kania, Anna Sfard and Lydia Bauman. The years travelled here were held up by Dor, Nikolai and Rhea, by Sian and Savannah. My friends in and around Thesis Eleven made all this possible, across the last four decades, as did the wider circles of those working on and with and sharing around Zygmunt Bauman. Three of my Melbourne friends might also see their influence here: Ghassan Hage, Nikos Papastergiadis and – alas, too late – Patrick Wolfe.

I thank Curtin University and my immediate colleagues in media, culture and creative arts for their support across these years of work, and La Trobe University for many years of support and stimulation – indeed, for that original affirmation and kick-start from 1988 and for the capacity to work with Bauman over the decades that followed. I thank my students and colleagues in literature and journalism at Sichuan University and my immediate colleague Fu Qilin, who has given me many things, including a last chance to team-teach and learn anew. I thank the National Library of Australia for accepting, storing and giving me access to my personal papers in Canberra.

Last, and first, Sian Supski and Caroline Wintersgill made this work possible. Tom Dark and Alun Richards saw it through Manchester University Press. Rebecca Willford and Mike Richardson edited and finalized the text. Alonso Casanueva Baptista created the Index.

Finally, amidst so much that looks back, there is also the warmth and light offered by the new arrival: Theodore Beilharz, aka Ted, 2018–.
