Acknowledgements

First of all, we would like to acknowledge the acumen, insights, analysis, and especially the patience of our outstanding contributors. They represent the finest in film research and scholarship, many of whom have stood out for years as experts in the field of French film. Moreover, they are always willing to take new forays that will open up the field. Their essays for this collection will serve as major contributions to the study of French literature and film, as well as to the practices of cinematic adaptations. We thank them wholeheartedly and feel proud to have them as colleagues in this collection.

Homer B. Pettey would like to express his admiration and sincere thanks to Professor Jennifer L. Jenkins for her support and assistance with this project. When other contributors – now unnamed, yet still anathema – dropped out, she willingly took on a major assignment for this collection. To her, he remains in great debt, and that debt remains on a daily basis. He would also like to thank his old friend William Johnsen, who, even without being a film scholar, might know more about French cinema history than the vast majority of the up-and-coming scholars in the field. He would like to thank his newly acquired friend of the past few years, Susan Hayward, for her generosity, her invaluable insights, and for her very warm friendship. She defines the best in the academy. He would also like to thank Allan Arffa, Carter Burwell, and Chip Johannessen for their continued friendship and for letting him join in their antics. Finally, as always, he would like to thank the Harvard Lampoon for its ridiculous inclusion of him among its members and for remaining a beacon of hope in an all-too-serious world.

Barton Palmer is grateful to the College of Art, Architecture, and the Humanities at Clemson, especially Dean Richard Goodstein, for continuing support of his research projects, including this one.
