The completion of this book brings the opportunity to reflect on how many people have supported me over the years, all having their part to play in the completion of this project, and on how lucky I am to be surrounded by such intelligent, caring and encouraging people. In the difficult periods of writing and research, especially towards the end of a project such as this, it is easy to lose sight of the many reasons to be thankful, but it is a pleasure to be able to take some time to express this here. First, I am grateful to the Department of History at the University of Nottingham and, while at Swansea, to the AHRC for funding my research. I had many fruitful and enjoyable visits to the local archives in Nottingham, Chester and Winchester, and am thankful for the invaluable work that these bodies and their staff do in preserving our heritage. I am grateful to MUP, especially Meredith Carroll, for astonishing efficiency, open communication and making this process as easy as possible. I would also like to thank the anonymous reviewers for their useful and attentive feedback at various stages of preparing this book. Thank you to Fiona Spooner for creating the map, as well as answering numerous questions about basic stats.

On a personal level, there are many people who have all played a part in shaping and supporting this project. Richard Goddard has been unfailing in his support of my research and career since introducing me to the joys of studying medieval urban society and medieval women's history as an undergraduate at Nottingham. In supervising my post-graduate research, he was always engaged, full of questions, and I thank him for treating me as a colleague and expert and providing me with the freedom to mould my own research path. In addition, Ross Balzaretti encouraged me to push the boundaries of my research and consider bigger questions that undoubtedly improved and refined my findings. Gwilym Dodd also suggested the comparison of towns that pushed this research to a new level. Cordelia Beattie has offered ongoing support, interest and advice on my work since examining my PhD thesis and has been particularly generous in offering feedback throughout the writing of this book. I am incredibly grateful to Deborah Youngs for providing the opportunity to develop my research within the luxury of a project (Women Negotiating the Boundaries of Justice) that was so perfectly aligned with my research and without which this book would not exist. Additional thanks are due for reading so much of my work over the last few years, offering new critical insight to my research and writing, for many fruitful and enjoyable discussions about women and the law, as well as ongoing support and advice. I have benefited hugely from being part of the project team, including collaboration and discussion with Emma Cavell and Rebecca Mason, who have been sounding boards for ideas and for the finding of common ground across our different research contexts.

There are many others with whom I have discussed this and other aspects of my work, including Sparky Booker, Sara Butler, Jeremy Goldberg, Maryanne Kowaleski, Alexandra Shepard, Matthew Stevens and Tim Stretton. They have all helped to refine my ideas and strengthen my arguments and have made me feel part of a community of scholars to which I hope I can add a valuable contribution.

The importance of being part of a community and having a sense of place and belonging has been of great importance over the many years during which this book has evolved. At Nottingham I am grateful for the PhD community, and in particular Emily Buchnea, Gemma Evans, Siobhán Hearne, Emma Lautman and Maroula Perisanidi, who all read or discussed various iterations of my work, but more importantly provided inspiration, friendship and fun throughout the PhD and beyond. At Swansea, Sam Blaxland, Catherine Rozier and Charlie Rozier (and Daisy!) offered friendship, support and a listening ear on many occasions. Away from work, Team Outcast of CrossFit Swansea have provided community, relief and a huge amount of fun that allowed me to survive and thrive in a new and unfamiliar place.

Thank you to my family and particularly my lovely mum, Jacqui Phipps, for being a constant source of love and support, for always seeming to have an answer to my worries, and giving me the space to pursue my interests, even without a clear sense of where they will take me. Finally, I thank Jess Hughes for being a source of inspiration and belief, for much needed moments of joy and adventure, and for giving me perspective at the times when I needed it the most.
