This book has been a long time in the making. While I have worked, in various ways, on the Second World War for over twenty years, I have always circled cautiously around what war does to human beings, both emotionally and physically. This book is an attempt to get to grips with death, which is at the heart of war – its management, and what it leaves behind. The impact of war on the human body, and the emotional, political and cultural responses to this, are the focus of this study.

I have been the beneficiary of research support and funding that has made visits to British national and local history archives possible. Thanks to the University of Brighton, and especially to Paddy Maguire, head of the School of Humanities, and to the History Department at the University of Essex. Thanks also to the archivists and librarians who have made this research easier and often, despite the subject matter, pleasurable. The staff of Bristol City Archives; the British Library; Clydebank Local History Centre; the Commonwealth War Graves Commission; Coventry City Archives; Glamorgan County Archives; Hackney Archives; Hull History Centre; the Imperial War Museum; London Metropolitan Archives; the Mass Observation Archive in the Keep, Brighton; the Mitchell Library, Glasgow; Newham Local History Centre; the National Archives in London and the National Records of Scotland in Edinburgh; the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland; Plymouth City Archives; and the Wolfson Centre, Library of Birmingham all provided invaluable help with the research for this book, often directing me to sources that I wouldn't otherwise have discovered. Particular thanks go to Max Dutton at the Commonwealth War Graves Commission, for sharing his research on headstone inscriptions. I wish to thank the trustees of Mass Observation for permission to quote from the archive. My editor at Manchester University Press, Emma Brennan, has been both supportive and extremely patient, as deadlines were passed time and time again.

Colleagues and students at the universities of Brighton and Essex provided wonderful environments within which this research developed and, I hope, matured. The often unacknowledged work that scholars around the world put into organising research seminars, workshops, colloquia and conferences is recognised, and thanked, here. The opportunity to share my 'work in progress' at research seminars and symposia at the universities of Cambridge, Edinburgh, Essex, Hanyang, Seoul, Lancaster, Kent, King's College London, Madison-Wisconsin, Manchester, Mississippi, Oldenburg, Oxford, Sussex and Warwick and invitations and opportunities to speak at the British Academy; the Library of Congress in Washington, DC; the North American Conference on British Studies; the Arts and Humanities Research Council 'Passions of War' International Research Network led by Philip Shaw at the University of Leicester; and the Social History Society Annual Conference, provided rich and valuable feedback from colleagues and helped to shape this work in numerous ways. For thought-provoking conversations, for hospitality and especially for their generosity in sharing their own ideas and research, I would particularly like to thank Afxentis Afxentiou, Alan Allport, Stephen Brooke, Joanna Bourke, Ian Cantoni, Mark Connelly, Alison Fell, Matthew Grant, Garitoitz Gomez Afaro, Rae Frances, Yasmin Khan, Senia Paseta, Bruce Scates, Kasia Tomasiewicz and Dan Todman. All errors are, of course, my own.

I am lucky to be surrounded by a generation of wonderful female historians, many of whom have become friends as well as inspiring colleagues. Sue Grayzel, Claire Langhamer, Tracey Loughran, Kate Newby, Helen Parr, Gill Plain and Penny Summerfield all read parts of this book, and were ready with wit, kindness and good coffee or wine whenever it was needed. Dorothy Sheridan has been, as ever, an inspiration and a role model of how to conduct thoughtful and ethical research.

I am also lucky in my family and in the times that I live in: my children, Hannah, Calum and Skye, have been able to grow up unscathed by the horrors of war, but with compassion for the many whose lives are still destroyed and thrown into chaos by this most terrible of human actions. I recognise my luck in being a woman living at this point in history. Growing up at the tail end of the welfare state, I benefited from a stable household income and a fantastic comprehensive school education, where I was taught by committed teachers who had the time to help us imagine other worlds and opportunities. I attended university on a full state grant. Thanks to my family and to feminism I never doubted that the world was as much mine as it was that of men, or of the wealthy and powerful. I have been able to combine a rewarding career with an equally rewarding family life; I hope that my children and my students have the same opportunities.

Finally, I am lucky in my partner, Martin Evans, whose appalling and endless jokes provided a welcome distraction from the grim nature of much of the research that informed this book. With his own deadlines, he still found time to listen to me talk endlessly about this project, and to read the manuscript with the care and tact that a partner needs to show when asked to be a critical friend. It's a thankless task, and I promise to do the same for him some day.
