Acknowledgements

The project that provided the foundation for this book began under the auspices of the Centre for Renaissance and Early Modern Studies at the University of York, and my heartfelt thanks are owed to the academics and postgraduates of this scholarly community. I am particularly indebted to Patricia Palmer and William Sherman, who provided constant and good-humoured guidance, and I am also grateful to David Attwell, Mike Jones, Nicola McDonald, Nick Moon, Varsha Panjwani, Regina Papachlimitzou, Kate Pond, Chloe Preedy, John Roe, Helen Smith, Louise Wilson, Rachael Williamson, and Rachel Willie, for stimulating conversations along the way. Two early readers, Andrew Hadfield and Kevin Killeen, gave valuable feedback and constructive criticism, and I am grateful to the AHRC, whose financial assistance enabled my travails.

Nick Davis, Hester Jones, Brian Nellist, and Simon Palfrey shaped my first encounters with Edmund Spenser at the University of Liverpool, and I thank them for fostering my love of early modern literature. I am also grateful for the interest taken in my Spenser project while I was at work on other tasks during postdoctoral years, in particular by Lukas Erne and Martin Leer at the University of Geneva, and by Matthew Woodcock at the University of East Anglia.

At the University of Bristol, the growing early modern community continues to energise my thinking and I would like to thank John Lee and Lesel Dawson, in particular, for their collegial support and friendship. I am grateful to Julian Lethbridge and Joshua Reid of The Manchester Spenser, and Matthew Frost at Manchester University Press, for helping see this project through to completion. The two anonymous readers provided generous and insightful advice at a vital time, saving me from myself on several occasions. In a book that takes a particular interest in errors and omissions, any of these remaining are of course my own.

Some of the arguments that appear here have been rehearsed in other guises and I am grateful to the publishers and editors in each case for permission to reproduce this material. An early draft of part of the Lucas Waghenauer section in Chapter 1 appeared as 'Mariners, Maps, and Metaphors: Lucas Waghenauer and the Poetics of Navigation' in a volume of Swiss Papers in English Language and Literature, and an early draft of part of Chapter 7 appeared in Renaissance Studies as "'The Compasse of That Islands Space': Insular Fictions in the Writing of Edmund Spenser'. Some of my thoughts concerning Spenser, romance, and landscape appeared in embryonic form in "'The Porch of that Enchaunted Gate": Spenserian Influences and the Romance of Place in Lamia by John Keats' in Romanticism.

My literary thinking has been shaped by several environmental encounters and thanks are owed to Richard Morris for leading a group of us in the footsteps of Gawain on a frozen New Year's Day, and to Jane Grogan, and especially to Mark Rasmussen and Jennifer Lewin, who became travelling companions along uncertain roads to Kilcolman. Most recently, my thanks are owed to the members of the University of Bristol's Centre for Environmental Humanities with whom I travelled to the island of Lundy.

Finally, I would like to thank Laurence Publicover, for his kindness and for his unfaltering belief in the end of this work being in sight, and my mother, Imelda Badcoe, for her support in this and in everything that has preceded it.
