Notes on contributors

Malcolm Chase, Professor of Social History at the University of Leeds, is the author of several publications relating to Cato Street. These include 'The People's Farm': English Radical Agrarianism, 1775–1840 (1988; revised edition, 2010) and 1820: Disorder and Stability in the United Kingdom (2013). He also contributed the entries on several of those connected to the conspiracy to the Dictionary of Labour Biography, Volumes 8 and 10 (1987 and 2000), and on both Thistlewood and the Cato Street Conspirators collectively to the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (2004).

Martin Conboy is Professor of Journalism History in the Department of Journalism Studies at the University of Sheffield. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society in 2012. He has produced ten books on the language and history of journalism and is widely published in journals and edited collections. He is also on the editorial boards of Journalism Studies; Media History; Journalism: Theory, Practice and Criticism; and Memory Studies.

John Gardner is Professor of English Literature at Anglia Ruskin University. He previously taught at the University of Glasgow and continues to work at several universities through external examining and fellowships. His current research is mainly concentrated in the first half of the nineteenth century and he has published extensively on literary cultures in the period. His monograph Poetry and Popular Protest: Peterloo, Cato Street and the Queen Caroline Controversy (2011) was short-listed for the ESSE prize. At present, he is researching the emergence of the First Mechanics' Institutes.

Richard A. Gaunt is Associate Professor in Modern British History at the University of Nottingham. A specialist in late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century British political history, he has published widely in monographs, scholarly editions and academic journals. Since 2013, he has been co-editor of the journal Parliamentary History. His publications include Sir Robert Peel: The Life and Legacy (2010) and a forthcoming study of Conservative Politics in the Age of Reform, 1780–1850.

Ryan Hanley is British Academy Postdoctoral Fellow in History at University College London. He has published articles on black history, race, slavery and abolition in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Britain. He has taught at the Wilberforce Institute for the study of Slavery and Emancipation (WISE) at the University of Hull and at New College, Oxford. In 2015, he was awarded the Royal Historical Society Alexander Prize for his article on Ukawsaw Gronniosaw, the first black author to be published in Britain.

Kieran Hannon holds degrees from the University of New South Wales, the University of Wollongong, Charles Sturt University and the Australian National University. He is a keen amateur historian whose main research is Australian convict transportation. He is the author of a book about Edward Woodhart, a prominent convict gardener in early Australia.

Jason McElligott is Director of Marsh's Library in Dublin and Adjunct Professor, School of History and Archives, University College Dublin. He is an expert in early modern British print culture with a specialist interest in later political and literary understandings of the English Revolution. He is currently writing a monograph on Book Theft in Eighteenth-Century Dublin and is working on an edition of the 'lost' diary of Bram Stoker.

Timothy Murtagh is a graduate of Trinity College Dublin, having written his thesis on Irish working-class radicals in the late eighteenth century (submitted 2015). He was the Irish Government Senior Scholar to Hertford College, Oxford (2015–16). In addition to working as a researcher and historical consultant for Dublin City Council, he is a visiting research fellow in Trinity College Dublin and is preparing a monograph on the formation of the Irish working class, 1776–1820.

Caoimhe Nic Dháibhéid is a Senior Lecturer in Modern History at the University of Sheffield. She is the author of two monographs, Seán MacBride: A Republican Life (2011) and Terrorist Histories: Individuals and Political Violence since the Nineteenth Century (2016).

Martyn J. Powell is Professor of Modern Irish History at Bristol University, and is a specialist in Irish political and social history. His books include Britain and Ireland in the Eighteenth-Century Crisis of Empire (2003), The Politics of Consumption in Eighteenth-Century Ireland (2005), and, with James Kelly, Clubs and Societies in Eighteenth-Century Ireland (2010). He is working on a study of the maiming of British soldiers by Ireland's urban 'houghers' and an edition of the political works of Richard Brinsley Sheridan for Oxford University Press.

Colin W. Reid is a Lecturer in British and Irish History at the University of Sheffield. He is currently writing a book on ideas of conceptions of government in nineteenth- and twentieth-century Ireland. He is the author of The Lost Ireland of Stephen Gwynn: Irish Constitutional Nationalism and Cultural Politics, 1864–1950 (2011, 2015) and a number of articles on the history of political ideas in Ireland and Britain.

John Stevenson is emeritus Reader and Fellow of Worcester College, Oxford. He has written extensively on British social and political history from the eighteenth century to the twentieth. His publications include Popular Protest and Public Order (ed. with R. Quinault), Popular Disturbances in England, 1700–1832, Order and Disorder in Early Modern England (ed. with A.J. Fletcher), London in the Age of Reform (ed.), The Slump (with C.P. Cook), and British Society, 1914–45. His most recent publication is William Cobbett, Romanticism and Enlightenment (ed. with J. Grande, 2015). He is now working on a larger study of William Cobbett and the revolutionary era.

Ajmal Waqif is a MA History graduate from Goldsmiths, University of London, with an interest in early socialism, internationalist working-class struggles and the subterranean continuities between 'premodern' and 'modern' radical politics in the long nineteenth century. He is preparing a PhD proposal concerning Thomas Spence and the Spencean Philanthropists, with an emphasis on their transnational inspirations and aspirations.