I owe thanks to many people who have known and helped me during the long gestation of this book. First to my teachers, especially the late Perry Keenlyside, whose energy spilled over into my own reading and thinking. Also to Michael Cook and Phillip Parr: their erudition and teaching led me towards teaching as a vocation. I hope to have done them all proud.

I also thank my university tutors, with whom I have had long conversations, and on whose advice, counsel, and knowledge I have often leant. I had many discussions with Thomas Docherty who encouraged me to think bigger, and to whom ‘thank you’ would seem too small, and this book would not have existed without the encouragement and boldness of Carol Rutter. I hope to have channelled some of her expertise. My thanks also to Anne Fogarty, and to Michael Gardiner who helped me to recognise what question this book could really attempt to answer. Thank you, too, to Declan Kiberd, for assisting me with Chapter 3, and to Stanley van der Ziel for supportive and enriching conversations for nearly ten years. A more recent discussion with Kaara L. Peterson was instructive.

To my colleagues at Hampton School and Highgate School: thank you for putting up with me wittering on about this project. Also to colleagues and friends in Swansea, I owe thanks for helping me on to the ladder. Diolch to Alice Barnaby, Kirsti Bohata, Georgie Lucas, Eoin Price, Richard Robinson, and Daniel Williams. Likewise to my English literature colleagues at Cardiff Met, Carmen Casaliggi and Elizabeth English, on whose welcome and support I have relied more than they are likely to know.

My eternal thanks to my students, many of whom were early audiences for my ideas (even without their realising). In this regard, I owe a special thanks to Katie FitzGerald, Ruby Gold, Anna Seale, Megan Sands, and Zara Shepherd-Brierley who happily read Seamus Heaney’s poems with me (and maybe even liked them by the end). Also to Nadia Ash and Jimi-Dean Miller, whose own journeys are just beginning, but whose conversations have already proven enriching.

Thank you to the organisers of the conferences and symposia where I first presented these ideas: King’s College, London; Queen’s College, Belfast; St Mary’s University; Swansea University; Trinity College, Dublin; Université Charles de Gaulle – Lille 3; University College Cork; University College, Dublin; University of Leeds; University of Stirling; University of Warwick; and University of York. I would also like to thank the librarians and archivists who have helped me. These include those at the British Library, the National Library of Ireland, the library of the University of Warwick, the library of Swansea University, and also the library of Cardiff Met, who were especially helpful during the recent COVID-19 pandemic when access to resources was extremely limited. The reference to Edna O’Brien’s teleplay The Wedding Dress in Chapter 5 is courtesy of the Special Collections at the BFI National Archive. Chapter 2 first appeared as “[R]emember me”: Hamlet, memory and Bloom’s poiesis’ in Irish Studies Review, 25.2 (2017), 241–58, and is reprinted by permission of the publisher (Taylor & Francis). Likewise, small passages of Chapter 4 first appeared as ‘Body and memory in Coriolanus’ in Notes and Queries, 68.1 (2021), 119–21, and they are reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press. Thank you to those presses, and also to Matthew Frost and his team at Manchester University Press who have been encouraging and helpful throughout the publication process. I am grateful to the reviewers for their generous and helpful comments.

In the early periods of researching this book I spent much of my spare time with a small group of dear friends. They patiently listened to my travails with Shakespeare and never failed with their encouragement. My thanks to them: Max Archer, Michael Bow, Hannah Brenton, Edward Field, Gemma Field, Cathryn Moses-Stone, Aoife O’Donnell, and Joseph Stone. I also thank Chris Rawnsley, my longest-suffering companion on the road from there to here; and I thank Malwina Fojcik for the stunning cover wrapping these pages.

I could not have succeeded in the ways I have without the support of my family. Primarily my parents, Lindsay and Stephen, who have provided more than they could justly be expected to – I will be forever thankful for them letting me squirrel another book under the duvet after bedtime, and for taking me to see A Midsummer Night's Dream in Regent’s Park. I was always accompanied there by my sisters, Lucy and Claudia, who have shown tremendous resilience in putting up with me all these years. Thank you. More recently I have been grateful for the support of the Taylor-Blunden clan, Berni, Phil, Charlotte, and Harry.

Words are insufficient – or, at least, I am a poor master of them – to explain properly how grateful I am to Emma. No idea recorded below has been thought and developed without her. No expression has gone untested. No moral unchallenged. I am better because of her, and this book is immeasurably improved after her scrutiny. Thank you. We are happily joined by our petit lionceau, Aryel Thomas, who has already wasted much of our time – though not nearly enough just yet. May he be interested enough to read this one day.

Though I have had this extraordinary support, errors may linger below; they are fully my own.
