This project has benefitted from funding from several sources, namely: Balliol College’s Peter Storey Scholarship, the Arts and Humanities Research Council, Oxford’s Vice Chancellors’ Fund, the Charterhouse Foundation, the Wiener-Anspach Foundation, and the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (Exzellenzcluster ‘Contestations of the liberal script’, EXC 2055, project ID 390715649).

The two biggest thanks must go to Martin Conway and Robert Gildea; I am very lucky and deeply grateful to have had both of them as mentors throughout this whole process. Martin has patiently read many drafts of this work across the years, providing invaluable advice both on the overall shape of the project and on its minutiae. He combines vast historical knowledge and intellectual acumen with self-effacing unflappability, and, on numerous occasions, he has pointed out to me what I was trying to say much more eloquently and succinctly than I was managing to say it. I was also hugely privileged to work with Robert, whose immense knowledge, careful guidance, steadfast support, and keen insights have been fundamental at every stage of this project. I would have been lost without his no-nonsense approach and his foul-mouthed good humour.

Several other historians have offered vital guidance and support. Julian Wright nurtured my interest in this topic while I was still an undergraduate and provided essential encouragement and practical help when I came to pursue graduate study, sharing many insights about time and French history along the way. Early on, Oliver Zimmer and Christina de Bellaigue gave helpful advice on the potential direction and contribution of the project. Christophe Prochasson generously offered incisive feedback on an early draft of Part I. I have been lucky to have had many stimulating conversations with Tom Stammers and Emile Chabal down the years—they have tirelessly posed me big questions about my work and they both exude an infectious enthusiasm for French history which has often reinvigorated me. I am grateful to count Matt Kerry as a collaborator and friend; we have shared fascinating and sustaining conversations about history, time, teaching, and the trials and tribulations of early career academia since we first worked together. Matt also offered perceptive advice on the introduction.

In Berlin, the ‘Temporality’ research group—particularly Sebastian Conrad, Anette Fasang, and Gudrun Krämer—provided insightful feedback on later drafts of the introduction and Part II. Anette’s indefatigable passion for research and her practical support with Humboldt’s labyrinthine administrative procedures were invaluable during the final stages of the project, when she guarded my writing time against the incursions of administrative duties. Benjamin Rogerson provided helpful reading suggestions, verified some key references at short notice, and diligently proofread the endnotes. Philipp Seilern was a constant source of calm counsel throughout many discussions about the book.

Staff at libraries and archives in Paris, Montreuil, Pierrefitte, and Orléans were unfailingly helpful, assisting me in tracking down source material with tenacity, patience, and affability. In particular, I would like to thank staff at the Bibliothèque François Mitterrand, where I spent many months researching. They also helped me to obtain the cover image for the book.

Editors at MUP, especially Alun Richards, provided essential guidance and support in numerous practical matters. The reports of MUP’s three anonymous readers were full of critical insights and suggestions for how to develop the manuscript, and series editor David Hopkin provided further feedback and offered helpful direction on how best to implement the readers’ advice. I would also like to thank the press for their patience and understanding during long delays, caused first by a serious injury I sustained while I was midway through writing the book, and then by the COVID-19 crisis.

Alice and Victoria Duhamel-Holt, Liz Schwarz, and Antoine Duriez all shared accommodation, friendship, food, and wine with me in Paris on numerous occasions. Liz also very generously put me up in London, entrusting me with her cats, who were a calming influence during an intense period of writing. At times I felt that I was staying in Alice’s flat more than she was, and I am especially grateful for her steadfast friendship, unwavering encouragement, and endless generosity.

Trying to finish writing a book during a pandemic and a series of lockdowns was a strange, difficult, and often frustrating experience. But it would have been a whole lot worse without the companionship of Roisín Brogan, whose support I have cherished. Roisín’s insistence that there is more to life than work or history has (just about) kept me sane amid the uncertainty and the upheaval. She makes me laugh every single day, and this has been precious indeed.

This book is dedicated to my parents, Bernice Paulin and Geoff Booth. Both teachers themselves, they always nourished and encouraged my love of study, and it was our many family trips to museums and galleries—including, appropriately enough for the subject matter of this book, the Greenwich Observatory—that prompted my curiosity about history as a child. In 2019, my progress with the book was suddenly interrupted by an accident which led to an operation and a difficult period of recuperation. My parents welcomed me back into their home and provided tireless and good-humoured practical and emotional support throughout. I am immensely grateful for all that they have done for me.
