The idea of a textbook for my students came during my first job at the University of Pennsylvania. Like many colleagues in the business, I would select chapters from different books and put together a reading package for students every summer. More than a decade of teaching around the world has led me to believe that the time has now come to write my own book.

I bothered many people in the making of this book and would like to thank them: Jennifer Ning Chang, Lai Hui-min and Lu Miaw-fen in Taipei, Chua Ai Lin, Lee Cher Leng, Albert Lau and Jianli Huang in Singapore, Thomas Coomans de Brachene in Belgium, Robert Bickers, Rana Mitter, Shogo Suzuki, Carl Kilcourse, Pierre Fuller, Michael Hoeckelmann and Luke Heselwood in the United Kingdom. I am very grateful to Jamie Carstairs, project manager at Historical Photographs of China, who provided me with the majority of the images used in this book; and Richard Atherton, Graphics Designer at Media Services, the University of Manchester, who helped fine-tune all the images. Ruili Zhang of the University of Manchester Library, David Helliwell and Colin Harris of the Bodleian Library, and the staff at the John Rylands Library, particularly those in the Centre for Heritage Imaging and Collection Care, were most helpful; so were the staff at the National Library of Australia and Academia Sinica in Taipei. John Moffett at the Joseph Needham Institute and Matthew Rothwell have been very gracious in giving me permission to reproduce images. I am most grateful to George Odysseos and Luke Kelly for copy-editing the manuscript, as well as to Emma Brennan, Paul Clarke, Lianne Slavin and Alun Richards at Manchester University Press, who have put up with many delays and endless questions, and to Ralph Footring, the freelance production editor.
