This book has been a long time, about a decade, in the making, and has been a journey of self-discovery as much as a social scientific endeavour. Over the years, this research project developed and matured into this critical book where I have found my own voice, approach and queer power. I would not have arrived at this point if not for the people that I have encountered over this period.

My journey started in 2011 in a small office at the KU Leuven, which I shared with Heleen Touquet. During this time we enjoyed many moments of, what can only be described as, intellectual cross-fertilisation. It was through this meeting of minds that her passion for the post-Yugoslav region and my deep interest in all things gender and sexuality together sparked my curiosity for LGBT politics in the Western Balkan region. No words can express what these conversations – which still continue to this day – have meant for me, and still do. Not only did they provide me with a research agenda and the introduction to a region where I have felt a strong sense of belonging, they also provided a mentor and great friend.

The second leg of this book’s journey centred around my research time at Queen Mary University of London. Here, I must first acknowledge that the research that ultimately translated into this book would not have been possible without the financial support of Queen Mary Westfield Trust Research Studentship. During this time, I was lucky to be supported by Paul Copeland, who not only kept encouraging me to push my arguments to their limits and make my mark with this book, but also became an invaluable friend.

During my time at Queen Mary University of London, I am also indebted to the excellent colleagues and friends with whom I shared an office space. Daniel Gover, Matheus Lock and Angus McNelly, in particular, stand out for the continuous and effortless support and friendship they have provided over the years. A particular thank you goes to Indraneel Sircar, whose shared interest for all things Balkan, coffee, biscuits, Eurovision and other talent shows have created wonderful moments of escape into absurdity and new scholarly avenues.

Living in London has not always been easy. At times it is a hard and difficult city, which I am sure I would not have survived if it were not for Jeremy Buckle. In fact, I am quite certain that without Jeremy’s support – whether it was by helping me move, providing me with a place to live in times of hardship, or just having a night out in the Yard with gin and tonics – this book probably would never have seen the light of day.

Doing fieldwork in Serbia and living in a country where I did not speak the language was at times challenging. However, also here, I was never alone. Jovanka Todorović has been part of my fieldwork from the start. Not only did she dedicate an incredible amount of time to my research – I think we must have had conversations about LGBT activism and politics in Serbia which in total exceeded more than twenty hours of material – but she was always willing to help me out whenever I was stuck or struggled to reach other informants. Similarly, Agata Milan Đurić was another friend, who was always ready to help me out and provide me with a healthy dose of positive energy whenever I needed it. I also want to explicitly thank Isidora Stakić for her friendship and walks, dinners and drinks, during my fieldwork.

More generally, I want to thank all the Serbian activists for their inspiring work – there are too many to name, and I am afraid of missing people out. I am incredibly grateful to have become part of your community and being able to contribute to your important work, and I hope we will find many more ways to work together to improve the lived experiences of LGBT people in Serbia. Similarly, I want to thank Amarildo Fecanji and Dragana Todorović for their work as ERA, the newly established regional LGBTI Equal Rights Association. Their work has not only inspired me, but being part of their first annual conference in Kosovo in October 2016 means more to me than anyone can ever imagine. Indeed, at a time when I had lost sight of why I did this research, the incredible gratitude of all the LGBT regional activists I experienced at that conference, and the fact that they ‘adopted’ me as part of their movement, provided me with the motivation and inspiration needed to finalise the research project and ultimately this book. So I want to thank the LGBT activist community in the Western Balkans for all their support.

This book would also not have been what it is without Milica Popović, Jelena Đureinović, Franko Dota, Marko Jurčić, Tamara Pavasović Trošt, Danica Igrutinović and Filip Ejduš, who not only commented on parts of my work, but also provided hours of insightful conversation about LGBT politics, Serbian politics and everything in between. Similarly, there is the sexuality and politics research community whose work, input and ideas have greatly inspired my work and this book. I want to particularly thank Momin Rahman who introduced me to the Queer IR crew and provided me with an academic home. I am honoured to be able to share intellectual discussions with and continuously learn from friends and colleagues such as Philip Ayoub, Cai Wilkinson, Anthony Langois, Markus Thiel, Manuela Picq, Matthew Waites, Ahmad Qais Munhazim, Andrew Delatolla, Denis Altman, Emil Edenborg, Michael Stambolis-Ruhstorfer, and Francesca Romana Ammaturo, but also more widely with feminist colleagues and friends such as Katharine A. M. Wright, Annick Masselot and Roberta Guerrina.

Finally, while I consider all these colleagues my friends, there are two who deserve a special mention. Mike Bosia and Dean Cooper-Cunningham have become more than just colleagues and friends. Throughout the pandemic we continue to face, they have each in their own ways helped me survive – a thing to look forward to and a safe space to break down in. Moreover, throughout this time, they helped me to embrace my queerness, push me out of my comfort zones and teach me so much about what the power of my scholarship can be, about my politics and above all myself.
