The collective effort that went into this book is illustrated not only by its contributors, but by Maeve Cohen who initiated it, Laurence Jones-Williams who helped steer it through choppy waters, Ali Al-Jamri who led Rethinking’s early work on decolonising economics and Juliet Michaelson who from start to finish was always there to provide invaluable support. They each, in their own way, made this book possible.

Without the help of many economics students and recent graduates worldwide who conducted peer-to-peer interviews, this book would lack some of the voices and stories behind the statistics. A big thank you to Adam Catt, Alby Berticević Nicols, Sandra Delgado, Maria Georgouli Loupi, Taïs Real, Mayada Hassanain, Liam Mullany, André Pedersen Ystehede, Matthew Yu, Marie Meyle, Veronica Mrvcic, Ben Newey, Chuchen Pan and Lizzie Friesen.

We appreciate all of the interviewees for sharing their stories about studying and working in economics. While we could not include everything you said, your experiences helped to shape the book’s arguments.

Thank you also to Ali Norrish for helping to conduct focus groups in schools, to the teachers who let us into their classrooms and to the students who welcomed us.

Special thanks to those who have advised us since the very beginning: Eshe Nelson, Marion Sharples, Ayeisha Thomas-Smith, Polly Trenow, Susanne Hofmann, and to those who provided constructive feedback on earlier drafts: Charu Agrawal, Rafael Galvão de Almeida, Louise de Gaudemaris, Bill Golden, Isbat Ibn Hasnat, Kavitha Ravikumar, Judy Seymour. Advice about diversifying and decolonising economics from Carolina Cristina Alvez and Ingrid Kvangraven was particularly appreciated and so too was guidance about economics and the living world from Kate Raworth.

RE’s international staff team also receive a special mention for their support since research for the book began.

We owe a big thanks to Jayati Ghosh for her patience and writing the foreword for this book. Seeing the work you do to diversify and decolonise economics is hugely inspiring. We are in debt to Paula Clarke Bain for wonderful copyediting and indexing and to our editor Tom Dark for his support and diligence.

We are also immensely grateful for the funding provided by the Women’s Rights Program of the Open Society Foundations, without which this book would not exist.

The people who have supported the creation of this book come from a variety of backgrounds, life experiences and with a range of ideas about what economics is, how it can be taught and practised, and by whom. Each of them is reclaiming economics in their own way and for this we are grateful.

We know that this book is just a small part of a much wider movement that is on a long journey towards a world where racial and social justice, gender equality and sustainable coexistence with the living world are a reality. Rethinking Economics will take this work forward working closely with allies across the world. We hope you will join us.
