Preface and acknowledgements

This project would not have been possible without the many residents, airtime sellers and riders amongst them, in Abidjan and Berlin whom I met during my fieldwork in both cities. The encounters were full of hospitality and I am grateful for learning so much through meeting every single one; and I thank them for showing me their worlds and their ways of making do and holding on. Particular thanks go to Stéphane, Eric, Darius & SII, Abidjan Lutte and Shalom International, who have been key to understanding Abidjan’s everyday business and introduced me to so many others. Similarly in Berlin, many thanks go to Deliverunion and the people involved, who facilitated access for me to interview partners and gain deeper insights into the world of work as a rider.

Many people have informed my sociological thinking for this project, but certainly one of the most significant was Talja Blokland. She has supported my project in many ways, but particularly through inspiring conversations in which she showed me how to ‘turn the glass’ to give phenomena a new perspective. I learned much about theory in practice and doing critical sociology. Her relational sociology profoundly informs my work. I thank her for her encouragement throughout the research and writing process, and the valuable advice she gave to get a ‘feel for the game’ in academia.

The Urbanizing Faith project was a starting point from where this journey began. I thank the entire team for this exciting research collaboration, which drew me into urban sociology beyond Berlin and Paris and was a start for me to ask questions about how to work on urban theory from cities ‘off the map’. Christine Hentschel and AbdouMaliq Simone were so much inspiration here – and I thank both of them for conversing, thinking together and giving me the opportunity to learn from their imagination. For this project, AbdouMaliq’s work on African cities laid an important ground for my fieldwork and research inquiry. I thank Christine for all the discussions we had throughout the process of developing my PhD, and her encouragement to think out of the box, and to make me feel that this project was valuable.

I am indebted to Ousmane Dembélé. Our research collaboration in the Urbanizing Faith project motivated me to continue learning about Abidjan. His knowledge of Abidjan as urban geographer, philosopher and entrepreneur was extremely valuable for developing the research project and doing the fieldwork. I am thankful for the many discussions we had in which he took the time to listen to my experiences in Abidjan and helped me to connect them to theoretical questions.

I thank Andreas Eckert for his important advice on literature and research perspectives from a global labour history, and his valuable comments on my research project. The Re:Work Kolleg with its lectures was an important place to help the project evolve, and I thank the team at Re:Work for providing me with infrastructure for a workshop related to my project.

I am grateful to the International Graduate Program Berlin-New York-Toronto (IGK) at the Center for Metropolitan Studies at Technical University Berlin, and thank in particular all my colleagues of the cohort 2015–18 for mutual support throughout the three years together. In particular I want to thank Katharina and Marlène for three amazing years as office neighbours! Daniel Tödt and Noa Ha have been wonderful tutors. The German Research Foundation (DFG) has provided generous financial support, without which my stays in Abidjan, and attendance at various international conferences and the summer school of ECAS in Cagliari would not have been possible. I would also like to thank the German Academic Scholarship Foundation for enabling me to visit the foundation’s summer schools while doing my PhD, and its uncountable support on the way there.

In Abidjan, as in Berlin, many other researchers have helped towards the realization of this project. In Abidjan, I thank in particular the ‘team Dembélé’: Adou, Appolinaire, Awa, Dénise, Estelle, Fatou, Djama, Lydie, Marie-Hélène, Nadja, Priscille, Sabine, Safi, Sanata and all those names which are missed, but who belonged here. Many thanks to Daniel. And to Ronan, for showing me Brakaguhé.
Moreover, the team at the Laboratoire de sociologie économique et d’anthropologie des appartenances symboliques (LAASSE), directed by Prof. Roch Gnabéli, and including Laurent Bazin, has been important to me, offering a research centre to present and discuss my research project. At the Department of Geography (Institut de Géographie Tropicale, Abidjan), I thank in particular Mireille and Sirikki. For the space in between Abidjan and Berlin, I want to express my sincere gratitude to Dominique, who has given me shelter for writing and thinking, and who contributed much to finding my way as a researcher from Europe in Abidjan.

In Berlin, I thank the team of the Urban and Regional Sociology Department at Humboldt Universität zu Berlin for their support and inspiring discussions around urban theory. In particular I would like to thank Daniela K. and Nina for commenting on later drafts of my writing. Another academic environment intellectually enriching for this research project was the NYLON-Einstein Circle, and I thank all members I met in these many years for the interdisciplinary dialogue, critical readings and peer-to-peer support. In particular, I would like to thank Hanna for her advice and for thinking together through informality. A special thanks goes to Daniela R., who was my friend and partner in crime during the numerous days passed at the library. My colleagues at the Lottum Street office helped me to continue writing and thinking in the difficult times of the pandemic, and I want to thank them for pizza and laughter, especially Nina.

My time at the Department of Political Sociology at Friedrich Schiller University in Jena as a postdoctoral researcher was very valuable to developing further theoretical discussions around work in the digital economy, and this book greatly benefitted from the conversations I had with Silke van Dyk and Stefanie Graefe on digital platform capitalism and ‘voluntariness’. I thank all the members of the DFG research group ‘Voluntariness’, led by Jürgen Martschukat, for the inspiring discussions at workshops and group meetings.

Many thanks to Awa, Fatou, Adou and Sanata, as well as Josefine and Roman for their transcription work. Thank you to Fatin Abbas for the English proofreading and editing.

I would like to thank Tom Dark, my editor at Manchester University Press, for his assistance and patience in guiding me through the manuscript writing process. I would also like to thank my anonymous reviewers for their careful and helpful comments on my draft at different stages of the process.

This project has received funding from the German Research Foundation (DFG) in the context of a fellowship in the International Graduate Program Berlin-New York-Toronto (IGK) at the Center for Metropolitan Studies at Technical University Berlin (2015–18). The German Academic Scholarship Foundation (Studienstiftung des deutschen Volkes) supported the research project in the form of a scholarship (ideelle Förderung) that enabled me to participate in workshops and events for career development.

The conversations on which this book is built were held in French, German and English. The quotes in foreign languages are translated by the author into English. Where the original meaning is difficult to translate, expressions in the foreign language are maintained and included in brackets in the quotes, using italics. All quotes from interlocutors in the field(s) have been anonymized.
