Whoever speaks incurs debt; whoever speaks further, discourses in order to pay back.

Peter Sloterdijk, Nietzsche Apostle

This book was written over the course of many years, during which I incurred innumerable debts of gratitude to friends, colleagues, and family members. But let me begin by expressing my appreciation for the institutional support I received from Arizona State University, especially the Provost’s Humanities Fellowship that provided a crucial opportunity to concentrate on this project as it began to take shape. The fellowship proved especially valuable due to the feedback and encouragement that I received from the other members of my writing group: Shahla Talebi, Kent Wright, and Juan Gil-Osle. My appreciation also goes to George Justice, Dean of Humanities, for organising the Provost’s Humanities Fellows Academy and to Louis Mendoza, Director of the School of Humanities, Arts, and Cultural Studies, for facilitating my research time during the academic year it took place. My colleagues, past and present, in the school have long provided an intellectually enriching environment for my research and I continue to feel fortunate to work amongst them. Those who were particularly supportive of this project include Owen Anderson, Duku Anokye, Christopher Hanlon, Patricia Huntington, Jeffrey Kennedy, Sharon Kirsch, Annika Mann, Miriam Mara, Francine McGregor, Jacob Meders, Eduardo Pagan, Arthur Sabatini, Michael Stancliff, Stefan Stanchev, and Eric Wertheimer. Thank you, all, for your unfailing generosity.

Over the long period that this project developed, I also profited immensely from the support of generous colleagues across the profession. Mostly directly, Gregory Castle, Nadia Louar, and James McNaughton, as well as the anonymous reviewers at Manchester University Press, did me the enormous service of reading and commenting on the manuscript at different stages. Each brought ample talent, considerable care, and generous spirit to the task and the book has benefitted greatly from it (though, of course, any flaws or infelicities that remain belong entirely to me). I should also give credit to the librarians and archivists who assisted me at the National Library of Ireland, University College Dublin, New York Public Library, and Arizona State University, especially Dennis Isbell at ASU’s Fletcher library for his friendly support and sage advice in the face of all manner of research conundrums.

Since its initial conception, this book has gained in ways both big and small from my many conversations with colleagues in Irish studies, modernist studies, and adjacent fields. For these felicitous occasions, I would like to voice my gratitude to Douglas Atkinson, Bree Beal, Claire Bracken, Michael D’Arcy, José Francisco Fernández, Matthew Fogarty, Margaret Kelleher, Seán Kennedy, David Lloyd, Emer Nolan, Angus Mitchell, Caoilfhionn Ní Bheacháin, Nels Pearson, and Feargal Whelan. To be sure, chats with this group during the long-drawn-out experience of research and composition continually reminded me to heed the wisdom of Nietzsche’s lovely maxim: ‘a good writer possesses not only his own spirit but also the spirit of his friends’. In this regard, special thanks should also go to Nicholas Allen for inviting me to speak on Joyce and Nietzsche at the Willson Center for the Humanities and Arts, and to Mark Quigley for inviting me to contribute an essay to a special issue on Ireland and the First World War. Those occasions prompted writing that later became portions of Chapters 3 and 4 of this book, so I would like to recognise the editors of Modernism/Modernity and Modernist Cultures for allowing me to reprint those materials, which first appeared in their journals.

Of course, my biggest debts of gratitude are owed to members of my family, who offered unwavering encouragement over the lengthy period this book was written. My appreciation goes to my mother-in-law, Jeri Richardson; my aunt, Nancy Foerster; my father, Patrick Bixby; my brother, Brian Bixby; my precious children, Claire and Owen; and my rock, my love, my accomplice in life, Nicole. Sadly, during the writing of this book, I lost my longest-standing supporter, my mother, Carolyn Bixby. How does one account for the debt owed to a beloved parent? She was my first role model as a reader, thinker, sceptic, and cultural wayfarer: an intellectual seeker, whose curiosity knew no bounds; a political interlocutor, with ardent and yet nuanced opinions; an author of op-eds, educational comics, and family recipe collections; a keeper of random customs from traditions around the world; but especially a Francophile who adored the language, treasured the literature, savoured the cuisine, haunted the museums, and rambled the boulevards. She was, for me as for many, a fiercely loyal friend and doting mentor, possessed of the ‘gift-giving virtue’. Nothing can repay the debt I owe to you, Mom, but this book is dedicated to your memory.
