I would like to thank the Charles Phelps Taft Research Center, University of Cincinnati, for an invaluable semester of research leave early in the project, and the Niehoff Center for Film & Media Studies for research funding. Any book owes a lot to the numerous discussions and ample feedback and insight received from colleagues, students, and anonymous readers. Some portions of Chapter 3 originally appeared in two articles that were published in Transnational Screens and Studies in European Cinema. Although the text has been significantly adapted, the feedback provided on those submissions has no doubt influenced the shape of that chapter. Students in my combined graduate seminars in French and Film and in Media Studies have, over the course of this project, contributed to vigorous debates about the concepts of borders, and pointed out numerous examples of hard and soft iterations of borders. Leslie Kealhofer-Kemp, Gemma King, and Thibault Schilt have contributed enormously helpful feedback on individual chapters. Randall Halle provided very useful feedback on elements of the project by inviting me to participate in a panel on the cinematic apparatus at SCMS 2018 in Toronto and in subsequent discussions. Hakim Abderrezak provided an essential boost for this research at an early stage by being the first person to invite me to speak about it. That 2018 talk at the University of Minnesota led to a great deal of useful feedback that helped kick my research into high gear. I would also like to thank Matthew Frost at Manchester University Press for his support of the project. Last but certainly not least, my family gets credit for putting up with my writing schedule and my need to watch and rewatch many hours of films and series that did not always interest them.
