Acknowledgements

First and foremost, I am most grateful for the support and guidance I received from Professor Shane Kilcommins. This book commenced life as a PhD thesis I completed under his supervision at the School of Law, University College Cork. That thesis, and the foundation for this book, would not have been completed without his expertise, insights, patience and good humour. I hope that one day I will be as inspirational a lecturer and academic as he is now.

I am also grateful for the insights on corporate theory provided by Professor Irene Lynch Fannon. This expertise complemented the expertise of Professor Kilcommins in his fields of regulatory theory, criminology and penology. I am grateful to have had the benefit of their different perspectives on corporate and white-collar criminality.

I also express my sincere thanks to Professor Jonathan Simon of University of California (UC) Berkeley for his kind, generous and thoughtful foreword. My only regret in having the endorsement of such a prominent and insightful scholar is that he easily manages to better express my own research findings than I do. It is an immense honour to have his encouragement and assistance.

I gratefully acknowledge the financial support I received from the Irish Research Council and the Millennium Research Fund at National University of Ireland (NUI) Galway. These sources allowed me to pursue fellowships at Harvard Law School, the Centre for the Study of Law and Society at UC Berkeley, and the Centre for Irish and Irish American Studies at New York University. I am grateful to each of these institutions for hosting me and providing me with experiences that enriched my research.

Institutional support from my former employer NUI Galway was generous and forthcoming. I also thank my current employer, the Sutherland School of Law at University College Dublin, for its support. I am very grateful to my students and colleagues at both institutions for allowing me to canvass their views on white-collar criminality. All of these experiences have positively informed my research for this monograph. I am also grateful to Dr James Cunningham for reading early versions of the proposal for this book and for his constructive suggestions on improvement. Tatiana Kelly proofread and checked the references for this book while completing a summer internship and I am thankful for her care and attention in doing so. I am also grateful to the team at Manchester University Press for all their assistance.

There are numerous friends and colleagues that provided enjoyable distractions and diversions while I was researching this book. These include: Alan Desmond, Eoin Daly, Eilionoir Flynn, Paul Fuller, Diarmuid Griffin, Ronan Hoare, Lughaidh Kerin, Tom O'Malley, Sinead Ring and Gerry Sadlier. In particular, Paul and Ronan visited me when I conducted research in the USA and our epic road trip from the West to East coast and back again will not be forgotten (or repeated).

Finally, this book is dedicated to my parents, Mary and Bill. As a child, they brought me to the library during the day and later confiscated my books at bedtime so that I would sleep at night. I am grateful to them for stimulating my interest in reading and for supporting my studies for longer than they probably thought was necessary. My godmother, Imelda, was also generous in her support and my godfather, Felix, kindly read an earlier (and much longer) draft of this book. In addition, I also want to thank my brothers Liam, John and Tom for their support. In particular, I thank John who encouraged me to pursue a career in academia because, he said, 'it would beat working for a living'. To the extent that I have found this path extraordinarily rewarding, he has proven correct.
