ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It would not have been possible to work on this study between 2004 and 2014 without a lot of support. I am grateful to the Arts and Humanities Research Council, whose Small Grant for the Performing Arts scheme helped to launch my research, and to the University of Kent, which supported the work and completion of this project with two periods of research leave. I am indebted to Christopher Balme, Patrice Pavis and Hans-Thies Lehmann for their constant friendship and mentorship through several decades of 'growing up' in theatre research. Patrice has also, with his characteristic generosity, provided ample comments on a draft version of this book. Ever since I set foot in UK academia, Maria Delgado, Paul Allain and the late David Bradby have been the most generous and inspirational advisers and supporters of my work. Maria has now also, along with Maggie Gale and Peter Lichtenfels, included this study in their series 'Theatre: Theory – Practice – Performance', which is an honour and a privilege for my first book-length monograph conceived, written and published in English. I am grateful to all three series editors for their encouragement, support and feedback, and the same goes for Matthew Frost at Manchester University Press. Further thanks go to many colleagues who have in various ways commented on and supported my research over the years, in particular Erika Fischer-Lichte, Janelle Reinelt, Marvin Carlson, David Savran, Günther Heeg, Peter Marx and the peer reviewers who have patiently worked through early versions of the manuscript. Christel Stalpaert, Johan Callens, Katja Schneider, Katharina Keim and Clare Finburgh have been very special friends and colleagues on many joint adventures. The Working Group 'Directing & Dramaturgy', which I once inherited as co-convenor with Jacqui Bolton and David Barnett from our predecessors and mentors Maria Delgado, David Bradby and Brian

Singleton, has been instrumental in developing the thinking presented in this book. Jennifer Parker-Starbuck, Louise Owen and Theron Schmidt have permitted me to 'pre-launch' some of its arguments when they invited me to London Theatre Seminar. Finally, I would have become entangled in a far greater Babylonian dissensus without the help of Helen Gush, who made sure that my idea of English now actually corresponds to the rules of the language, except where I insisted on ignoring her scrupulous advice and her persistent admonitions about sentences spanning several paragraphs while lacking any detectable sense. The European Theatre Research Network at the University of Kent has enabled me to employ Helen, and also to obtain copyright permissions to reprint the photographs. I would like to thank in addition all the photographers and companies in question for granting permission to reprint these images in the present book. I dedicate this book to Johanna for her patience and support of theatrical madness.
