Acknowledgements

This collection of essays derives from an international conference held in Trinity College Dublin (23–25 October 2009) on the theme of ‘Plantation and reaction: The 1641 rebellion’. Many of the papers were presented at this conference or were delivered at the Ninth Lewis Glucksman Memorial Symposium on ‘War and atrocity: the 1641 depositions’ (22 October 2010), which was hosted by the Trinity Long Room Hub, or at the Trinity Department of History’s ‘Early Modern Research Seminar’. A particular highlight was Aidan Clarke’s lecture, which he delivered to a packed house at Dublin Castle on 23 October 2009. It was made possible thanks to the generosity of the Office of Public Works and Dublin City Council and especially the City Manager, John Tierney. We are deeply grateful to our fellow contributors, the co-organisers and the audiences at these events for participating in them with such enthusiasm.

This volume is very much part of the wider ‘1641 Depositions Project’, which began in 2006 when the Irish Research Council for the Humanities and Social Sciences awarded Jane Ohlmeyer a Government of Ireland Major Research Project Grant (€247,000) for the digitisation, transcription and online publication of the depositions relating to Ulster. The following year the Arts and Humanities Research Council awarded Micheál Ó Siochrú, then at the University of Aberdeen, and John Morrill, Cambridge University, a grant of €650,000 to do likewise for the three other provinces. Micheál Ó Siochrú moved to Trinity later that year and Tom Bartlett took over as the AHRC Principal Investigator in Aberdeen. Trinity College Dublin provided additional funding for conservation. We are deeply grateful to these bodies for funding the 1641 Project, together with this collection of essays and other major events – the 2009 conference, other colloquia at Trinity, Aberdeen and Cambridge and a major exhibition in the Long Room.

The 1641 Depositions Project began in October 2007 and ended in October 2010 on time, within budget and over specification. All of the depositions are now freely available online <http://1641.tcd.ie>. Much of the credit for this achievement must go to the ‘core’ team of transcribers, Annaleigh Margey, Edda Frankot and Elaine Murphy, and to Aidan Clarke, who is the general editor of the project. Their commitment, good humour and hard work was deeply appreciated. They helped to make this project the success it is.

We would also like to thank the former Trinity Provost, Dr John Hegarty, the former Dean of Research, Dr David Lloyd, and our colleagues in the Communications Office, in High Performance Computing, in the Trinity Long Room Hub, and in the School of Histories and Humanities, especially the History Department, for their support and goodwill. In all over 50 archivists, computer scientists, conservators, historians, historical geographers, linguists and literary scholars became involved in the project, and the fact that a cross word was rarely exchanged is a tribute to their collective enthusiasm for it. Throughout we worked closely with Brian Donovan and Eneclann, who digitised the depositions, and with our colleagues in the Library, especially, Robin Adams, the former College Librarian, Bernard Meehan, College Archivist, Susie Bioletti, Head of Conservation and Tim Keefe, Head of Digital Resources and Imaging Services. Colleagues from Trinity’s School of Computer Science, especially Shay Lawless and Vinnie Wade, played an increasingly important role in the project as did IBM LanguageWare, especially D.J. McCloskey and Marie Wallace. Eamon Darcy and Felicity O’Mahony helped to curate a wonderful exhibition (October 2010–April 2011) in the Long Room, ‘Ireland in Turmoil’, which allowed us to show case the depositions and related materials. Elaine Murphy and Ciaran Wallace worked with a small army of History graduate students as they normalised the spelling of names and matched seventeenth-century placenames with their modern equivalent. We are also deeply grateful to Barbara Fennell, who led the AHRC-funded ‘Language and linguistic evidence in the 1641 depositions’ (2010–11), and her team, especially Mark Sweetman, for their support.

Producing a volume like this always takes longer than one might wish. We would like to thank Manchester University Press for their professionalism, and Ian Campbell who worked as sub-editor, standardising the footnotes. They and our fellow contributors have been a delight to work with and we have truly appreciated their patience and good humour.

Jane Ohlmeyer and Micheál Ó Siochrú
Trinity College Dublin