This book is based on research carried out as part of a Wellcome Trust University Award (grant no. 081454/Z/LS/HH) on the construction of the patient-consumer in Britain from 1960 to 1991. I am grateful to the Wellcome Trust for this grant and to the Faculty of Public Health and Policy at the London School of Hygiene & Tropical Medicine (LSHTM) who took on the funding of my position. The LSHTM is a fantastic place for a historian of medicine to be based, close to the 'coalface' of contemporary health policy and practice, but also surrounded by a group of historians and social scientists. Members of the Centre for History in Public Health, and especially Stuart Anderson, Martin Gorsky, Angela Grainger, Anne Hardy, Ingrid James, Susanne MacGregor, Gareth Millward, Jane Seymour, Chris Sirrs and Sue Taylor have all supported and enriched my work in innumerable ways. The Centre's Director, Virginia Berridge, has been and continues to be, a wonderful mentor, offering invaluable advice and guidance throughout this project and beyond.

Away from the LSHTM, discussions with Gayle Davis, Matthew Hilton, Beatrix Hoffman, Hilary Marland, David Reubi, Sally Sheard, Nancy Tomes, Elizabeth Toon and Duncan Wilson all helped my work develop. So too, did the numerous seminar and conference audiences who listened to me talk about my work over the years; particularly helpful were those at Imperial College, the universities of Cambridge, Warwick, Exeter, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Zurich and Glasgow. I feel extraordinarily lucky to be a part of a vibrant history of medicine community that spans the UK, Europe and North America, and the work of people within this community has fed into this book in all sorts of ways.

Historians, even those that study the contemporary period, remain reliant on libraries and archives. Archivists at the Wellcome Library, The National Archives, the Modern Records Centre at the University of Warwick, The Churchill Archives, Churchill College, Cambridge and Birmingham City

Archives all provided invaluable assistance. The libraries of the LSHTM and the London School of Economics, as well as Senate House Library, the Wellcome Library and the British Library gave me access to books and articles that were crucial to this project. I would also like to thank the many individuals that I interviewed and spoke to informally about the history of patient consumerism.

Some parts of this book have been published as articles in the Historical Journal, the American Journal of Public Health, the Journal of Social Policy and the Bulletin of the History of Medicine. I am grateful to the peer reviewers of these articles, and also of this book, for their insightful comments, and suggestions for improvements. Thanks also to Tony Mason at Manchester University Press who oversaw the publication of this book.

Last, but by no means least, I would like to thank my friends and family. During the research and writing of this book, I lost my grandmother Doreen Tanswell and my dear friend Francesca Carnevali. The dignity of both of these strong women taught me more about what it means to be a patient in the modern NHS than any book or article. My parents, Richard and Lindsay Mold, my grandmother Elsie, my sister Becky, my brother-in-law Tim, my mother in-law Lois, my nieces Annabelle and Eloise and my nephew Tom, have all helped to keep me sane and remind me that there is life away from academia. Most of all, I would like to thank Noelle, for her love, her patience, and her smile. It is to her that this book is dedicated.
