ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book was formed from conversations at a series of conferences surrounding the bicentenary of British abolition of the slave trade. Working on British slave-trade suppression, in different disciplines, we agreed that a new academic history of this campaign was overdue. In the subsequent years, we recruited specialists to meet our aims for a volume that incorporated African experiences, metropolitan literature and cultural histories of suppression. The quality of their contributions exceeded our greatest hopes, and we have enjoyed working with them all. We remain indebted to organisers of a conference at the National Museum of the Royal Navy in 2007 and an AHRC-funded workshop at the National Maritime Museum in 2009 for the ideas they provoked us to pursue.

We are particularly grateful to Douglas Hamilton and John Oldfield and colleagues in our current and past universities for encouragement as we prepared the chapters. Robert Burroughs would like to acknowledge the support of a Leverhulme Trust Early Career Fellowship in enabling the research on which his contributions to this volume are based. He also received the support of a Promising Researcher Fellowship at Leeds Beckett University while writing parts of this volume, and Richard Huzzey benefited from research funding and an early career international networking award from Plymouth University and support from the Department of History at the University of Liverpool. We would also like to thank the Picture Library of Royal Museums Greenwich for kind assistance in preparing this volume.

Emma Brennan at Manchester University Press and our series editors, John MacKenzie and Andrew Thompson, have been outstandingly patient and supportive. We are both grateful to our families and, most of all, our wives Antoinette Burroughs and Irene Middleton for their tolerance of weekends tweaking the format of references and evenings responding to each other's editorial queries. We very much appreciate Irene's work preparing the index and proofreading.
