Acknowledgements

Many of a writer's principal debts will be owed to other writers he or she has never met. I will allow the conventions of academic referencing to take care of most of these debts, but I wish to pay particular tribute to Robin Wood (1931–2009), who, as already mentioned, provided in his writing the point of departure for the earlier project out of which this book emerges, and who stands as a model of engaged, humanistic criticism, and of beautiful writing. Even though he lived in Canada and I live in the UK, I always expected that I would one day meet him, and I am sad that this never occurred.

The doctoral research which preceded this book and the master's study which preceded that was funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council, to whom I am extremely grateful. Before that I was supported in a much more comprehensive manner by my parents, Andrew and Joanne Zborowski. I cannot thank them enough.

Throughout my undergraduate, taught postgraduate and doctoral studies, I enjoyed the privilege of being guided by the wonderful staff of the Department of Film and Television Studies at the University of Warwick. That department possesses all the vigour one would expect of such a prestigious unit, but also creates the room for creativity and individual attention and nurture that are all too rare in contemporary higher education. Before I proceed to thank individual members, I would like to thank all the staff, both academic and administrative, and all of the students with whom I interacted during my time there.

Victor Perkins supervised the first year of my doctoral research. Beyond this, his presence in the department and his great generosity with his time and intellectual resources have been of immeasurable help to me. Victor provides a constant and formidable model of critical writing. A second, equally formidable model for me has been Charlotte Brunsdon.

From no other teacher have I learned as much about the importance of methodology and reflection upon it. Ed Gallafent supervised my doctoral research in its second and third years. Ed's engagement with my thinking and writing, besides being a model of thoroughness, was always insightful, and often unpredictable (in the best possible way). During his doctoral supervision, our shared teaching commitments, and beyond, Ed was unfailingly generous, intuitive and supportive. Catherine Constable did more than anyone else to guide me in what I needed to do as I emerged, blinking, into the post-Ph.D. world. She prodded and guided me through procedures including book proposals and job applications. Every post-postgraduate should have a career mentor who is so generous with her time and attention, and so direct in her guidance. Fellow film studies postgraduates I would especially like to acknowledge are Paul Cuff, Stuart Henderson, Tom Hughes, Claire Jenkins, Wujung Ju, Chris Meir, Michael Pigott, Nicolas Pillai, Laura Sava, Jaakko Seppälä, Jason Simpkins, Anna C. Sloan, Tom Steward and Timotheus Vermeulen.

At the University of Hull, I have benefited from the collegiality of my most immediate teaching colleagues, past and present: James Aston, Alan Burton, Denise Carter, Charlie Cordeaux, Amy Davis, David Eldridge, Barnaby Haran, Athina Karatzogianni, Iris Kleinecke-Bates, Jo Metcalf, John Osborne, Jenel Virden and Simon Willmetts. Thank you to Amy for being my most reliable interlocutor, and to Athina for all her provocations and stimulations. Various colleagues at Hull, past and present, read versions of this book at different stages in its development: Alan Burton, Ann Heilmann, John Osborne and Neil Sinyard. John in particular provided detailed and direct comments which prompted valuable revisions. Further afield, Andrew Klevan, although he only read a small portion of a near-final version of the manuscript, offered comments that led to significant redrafting. He also, at an earlier stage, recommended Gilbert Ryle to me at exactly the right time. Thanks also to Lucy Fife Donaldson, John Gibbs and Douglas Pye, who all influenced the thinking and work that led to this book in important ways.

Thank you to all the staff at Manchester University Press for their commitment to the book throughout its various versions, and to the anonymous readers they employed, each of whom offered helpful advice and feedback.

For intellectual stimulation and companionship beyond the academy, thanks to Richard George, Rachel Mann, Leo Robson and Pete Thomas.

Pete Falconer became a great friend, a stunning source of cultural knowledge and an indispensable intellectual companion to me during my postgraduate studies, and he has remained so. In Pete's company one feels acutely and in a particular way one of the key tenets of this book: that conversation is a form of education.

James MacDowell, another fellow Warwick film studies postgraduate, is the one person with whom I have lived and talked film studies the most, and with his help I have arrived at clearer or deeper articulations and understandings of various works of film studies, and of film art. James has also been this book's most steadfast champion (at times defending its value even in the face of its author's doubts and dismissals), and has attended to and helped to shape its development and details more than any other reader, by scrutinising multiple drafts and engaging in long, long exchanges about the words and arguments on the page. The imagined or implied interlocutor at various points in what follows often started life as the real-life James MacDowell.

My wife Louise Zborowski has lived with the contents of this book for well over half the time that she has lived with me, and has through all that time been a source of conversation, inspiration and love, as well as much-needed distraction and perspective. And in the time that it has taken me to produce one book, we have produced two children, Lyra and Rufus (the former fact, of course, not being entirely independent of the latter!). Infants do not help the book-writing process in obvious ways, but there is nothing like them to focus the mind (at first, in terror!), and also to renew one's perception of the world more thoroughly than any artwork can hope to.

This book is dedicated to four people, for the individual reasons given above, and because together they comprise my University of Warwick 'Hollywood cinema' collective: Catherine Constable, Pete Falconer, Ed Gallafent and James MacDowell.
