Fiona Bloomer is Research Associate with the Institute for Research in Social Sciences, University of Ulster. Fiona specialises in research in social policy with a focus on issues related to sectarianism and community relations in Northern Ireland. More recently she has conducted research on the activities of pro-choice groups campaigning for reform of the abortion legislation in Northern Ireland. Her experience draws from five years as research director at Trademark and ten years in Northern Ireland Research and Statistics Agency, where she was seconded to the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, and the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure.

Úna Crowley is Director of Teaching and Learning and Head of Academic Advisory in NUI Maynooth. Úna has responsibility for the day-to-day functioning of both the Academic Advisory Office and the Centre for Teaching and Learning, the development of initiatives in the University, and for overseeing strategic teaching and learning projects funded under the National Strategic Innovation Fund (SIF1 & 2). Her teaching and research areas include equality issues in education, undergraduate retention and completion, inclusion and interculturalism and the social, cultural and political history of twentieth-century Ireland.

Eoin Daly is Lecturer in the School of Law at NUI Galway, where he teaches Constitutional Law, Legal Theory, and Law and Religion. His research focuses on the relationship between constitutional law and political theory, with a particular focus on constitutional secularism and legal issues surrounding religion in schools. He is author of Religion, Law and the Irish State: The Constitutional Framework in Context (Clarus, 2012). He has also published papers in Legal Studies, the Merike Darmody is Research Officer at the Economic and Social Research Institute and adjunct Assistant Professor in Sociology at Trinity College Dublin. Her key area of interest lies in sociology of education. Recent work includes studies on ethnic, cultural and religious diversity in Irish primary and secondary schools. She has co-edited a book on the experiences of migrant children in Ireland, The Changing Faces of Ireland: Exploring the Lives of Immigrant and Ethnic Minority Children, and co-authored articles and chapters on this topic. She has recently been a national expert in a European Commission-funded international comparative study on the educational needs of newly arrived migrant children.

Gavin D. Duffy is Research Fellow attached to the Sharing Education Programme in the School of Education at Queen’s University Belfast; BA (Hons) Sociology and Scholastic Philosophy, MSSc Criminology and Criminal Justice and PGCE in Secondary Education. His doctoral research involved an ethnographic study of a custodial education centre for young people. He has published on themes such as rehabilitation and educational disengagement. His current research seeks to understand more about the context of effective collaboration within networks of schools and examines institutional relationships forming between schools from different sectors, in particular those operating in contested space settings.

Tony Gallagher is Professor of Education and Pro-Vice-Chancellor at Queen’s University Belfast. His main research interest lies in the role of education in societies marked by ethnic conflict, although he is also interested more generally in issues related to equality and social inclusion in education. He has worked in Northern Ireland, South East Europe and the Middle East, with Israeli and Palestinian educators, and acted as a consultant for government departments, public bodies, voluntary and community organisations and international organisations. His current main work explores effective methods of school collaboration to raise standards and promote new relationships across denominational divisions in Northern Ireland (www.schoolsworkingtogether.co.uk).

Chris Gilligan is Senior Lecturer in Sociology at the University of the West of Scotland. He previously held lecturing posts at Aston University and the University of Ulster. He is Reviews Editor for the journal Ethnopolitics. He has eclectic interests but his main field of research is in the broad area of nations, ‘race’ and ethnicity. He has edited (or co-edited) collections on the peace process in Northern Ireland and on migration. He also has an ongoing interest in the use of visual methodologies in social science research.

Jennifer Hamilton is Lecturer in Social Policy at the University of Ulster, specialising in gender, ethnicity and research methods, and associate member of the Institute for Research in Social Sciences. Her research has included investigating the level of service provision, mainly in the health and education sectors, for minority ethnic communities. She has also conducted research into social cohesion among migrants and existing residents, and the level and impact of racism in Northern Ireland. More recently she has been involved in research on the impact of human trafficking and forced labour on victims and society.

Iseult Honohan is Senior Lecturer in the School of Politics and International Relations, University College Dublin. Her research interests lie in republican political theory, and its application to issues of citizenship, immigration and diversity. Her publications include Civic Republicanism (Routledge, 2002), ‘Friends, strangers or countrymen? The ties between citizens as colleagues’, Political Studies (2001), and ‘Toleration and non-domination’, in Hard to Accept: New Perspectives on Tolerance, Intolerance and Respect (Palgrave, 2013). She is a partner in EUDO Citizenship, developing an observatory of citizenship laws in Europe (http://eudo-citizenship.eu/).

Neil Jarman is Director of the Institute for Conflict Research (ICR), an independent organisation based in Belfast since 1996, which has carried out baseline studies of hate crime between 1999 and 2010. In 2004–5 Neil was a specialist adviser for the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee for its enquiry into Hate Crime in Northern Ireland. More recently ICR has carried out research on human trafficking for the Equality and Human Rights Commissions (2009) and on forced labour for the Joseph Rowntree Foundation (2011). ICR has recently completed a study of how the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland is responding to hate crimes.

Rob Kitchin is Professor and ERC Advanced Investigator in the National Institute of Regional and Spatial Analysis at the National University of Ireland Maynooth. He has published widely across the social sciences, including twenty-one books and over 130 articles and book chapters. He is editor of the international journals Progress in Human Geography and Dialogues in Human Geography, and formerly of Social and Cultural Geography. He has successfully written or been a principal investigator grants totalling c. €34 million. He is currently a PI on the Programmable City project, the Digital Repository of Ireland and the All-Island Research Observatory.

Ruth McAreevey is Lecturer in Environment Planning at Queen’s University Belfast. Ruth has a breadth of professional experience gained through various positions in the voluntary and statutory sectors. Since her time in QUB Ruth has acted as Research Manager in the Gibson Institute for Land Food and Environment, Research Support Officer and Framework 6 Project Manager, and as a non-executive Board Member of the Northern Ireland Rural Development Council. She is currently conducting research for the Joseph Rowntree Foundation on migration, ethnicity and poverty. Her sole authored volume on migration is forthcoming with Routledge.

Cillian McBride is Senior Lecturer in Political Theory at the School of Politics, International Studies and Philosophy, Queen’s University Belfast. His teaching area is Contemporary Theories of Justice and Modern Political Thought. His research interests are in contemporary political theory, particularly the ethics and politics of recognition, deliberative democracy, republicanism (non-domination) and political liberalism. He was involved in an international research project investigating Processes Influencing Democratic Ownership and Participation (PIDOP 2009–12). In 2009 he co-ordinated, with Professor Shane O’Neill, an ESRC-funded seminar series on The Politics of Recognition and the Dynamics of Social Conflict. He is the author of Recognition (Polity, 2013).

Duncan Morrow is Director of Community Engagement at the University of Ulster, responsible for developing the University’s partnerships with groups and organisations across the community, and lecturer in Politics at Jordanstown. He has been appointed to chair the Ministerial Advisory Committee on Tackling Sectarianism for the Scottish Government. Previously he has been research officer in the Centre for the Study of Conflict, in the University of Ulster at Coleraine, Director of the Future Ways, Chief Executive of the Community Relations Council, where he championed the concept of a shared future, an adviser to the Ashdown Commissioner on Parading and a Parole Commissioner for Northern Ireland.

Neil O’Boyle is Lecturer in the School of Communications and Cluster Director of the International Media, Interculturalism and Migration research cluster in DCU and a member of the Migration and Citizenship Research Initiative in University College Dublin. He was formerly lead researcher on the IRCHSS theme-funded project ‘Immigration and Social Change in the Republic of Ireland’ and is co-author of the report ‘New Irish Politics: Political Parties and Immigrants in 2009’. Neil’s research interests include migration, communication theory and the cultural industries. His first book, titled New Vocabularies, Old Ideas: Culture, Irishness and the Advertising Industry (Peter Lang) was published in 2011.

Michael Potter is a PhD candidate at the School of Politics, International Studies and Philosophy at Queen’s University Belfast. Michael has published works on issues relating to inclusion for minority ethnic identities and for women in post-conflict societies, specifically in Northern Ireland and the Balkan region.

Nathalie Rougier is Researcher for the ACCEPT Pluralism Project in the School of Politics and International Relations, University College Dublin. Previously she has been research co-ordinator for the ITENIBA Project (Intergenerational Transmission and Ethno-National Identity in the Border Area) at the UCD Geary Institute and has collaborated to two projects at the Commission for Migration and Integration Research (KMI) in Vienna, Austria. Her main research interests revolve around issues of identity construal and (re)definition over time and across socio-cultural contexts; inter-group and intercultural relations; integration and belonging; and prejudice and discrimination.

Emer Smyth is joint co-ordinator of Education Research at the Economic and Social Research Institute and head of Social Research Division. Her areas of interest include education, school to work transitions, comparative methodology and gender issues. She led the Post-Primary Longitudinal Study, following a cohort of young people from the first year of second-level education onwards. Emer co-ordinated a FP7-funded comparative project, Religious Education in a Multicultural Society (REMC), and is on the management team of the Growing Up in Ireland study. She is co-editor of the journal Irish Educational Studies. 